Commendam is a benefice, which, being void, is commended to the charge and care of some sufficient clerk, to be supplied until it be conveniently provided of a pastor. Cowell.

It had been once mentioned to him that his peace should be made, if he would resign his bishoprick, and deanery of Westminster; for he had that in commendam. Clarendon.

COMME'NDATARY, kôm-mĕn'dâ-tâ-rē.[512] n. s. [from commendam.] One who holds a living in commendam.

COMMENDA'TION, kôm-mĕn-dâ'shŭn. n. s. [from commend.]

1. Recommendation; favourable representation.

This jewel and my gold are yours; provided I have your commendation for my more free entertainment. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

The choice of them should be by the commendation of the great officers of the kingdom. Bacon.

2. Praise; declaration of esteem.

His fame would not get so sweet and noble an air to fly in as in your breath, so could not you find a fitter subject of commendation. Sidney.

3. Ground of praise.

Good-nature is the most godlike commendation of a man. Dryden's Juvenal, Dedication.

4. Message of love.

Mrs. Page has her hearty commendations to you too. Shaksp.

Hark you, Margaret,
No princely commendations to my king!——
——Such commendations as become a maid,
A virgin, and his servant, say to him. Shaksp. Henry VI.

COMME'NDATORY, kôm-mĕn'dâ-tŭr-rē.[512] adj. [from commend.] Favourably representative; containing praise.

It doth much add to a man's reputation, and is like perpetual letters commendatory, to have good forms; to attain them, it almost sufficeth not to despise them. Bacon's Essays.

We bestow the flourish of poetry on those commendatory conceits, which popularly set forth the eminency of this creature. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

If I can think that neither he nor you despise me, it is a greater honour to me, by far, than if all the house of lords writ commendatory verses upon me. Pope.

COMME'NDER, kôm-mĕn'dŭr. n. s. [from commend.] Praiser.

Such a concurrence of two extremes, by most of the same commenders and disprovers. Wotton.

Is our knowledge adequately commensurate with the nature of things? Glanville's Scepsis.

Those who are persuaded that they shall continue for ever, cannot chuse but aspire after a happiness commensurate to their duration. Tillotson.

Nothing commensurate to the desires of human nature, on which it could fix as its ultimate end, without being carried on with any farther desire. Rogers's Sermons.

Matter and gravity are always commensurate. Bentley.

COMME'NSURATELY, kŏm-mĕn'shŭ-rāte-lė. adv. [from commensurate.] With the capacity of measuring, or being measured by some other thing.

We are constrained to make the day serve to measure the year as well as we can, though not commensurately to each year; but by collecting the fraction of days in several years, till they amount to an even day. Holder on Time.

COMMENSURA'TION, kŏm-mĕn-shŭ-rā'shŭn. n. s. [from commensurate.] Proportion; reduction of some things to some common measure.

A body over great, or over small, will not be thrown so far as a body of a middle size; so that, it seemeth, there must be a commensuration or proportion between the body moved and the force, to make it move well. Bacon's Nat. History.

All fitness lies in a particular commensuration, or proportion, of one thing to another. South.

To CO'MMENT, kŏm'mĕnt. v. n. [commentor, Lat.]

1. To annotate; to write notes upon an author; to expound; to explain: with upon before the thing explained.

Such are thy secrets, which my life makes good,
And comments on thee; for in ev'ry thing
Thy words do find me out, and parallels bring,
And in another make me understand. Herbert.

Criticks having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceeded to comment on him, and illustrate him. Dryden's Juvenal, Dedication.

They have contented themselves only to comment upon those texts, and make the best copies they could after those originals. Temple.

Indeed I hate that any man should be idle, while I must translate and comment. Pope.

2. To make remarks; to make observations.

Enter his chamber, view his lifeless corps,
And comment then upon his sudden death. Shaksp.

CO'MMENT, kŏm'mĕnt.[492] n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Annotations on an author; notes; explanation; exposition; remarks.

Adam came into the world a philosopher, which appeared by his writing the nature of things upon their names: he could view essences in themselves, and read forms without the comment of their respective properties. South's Sermons.

All the volumes of philosophy,
With all their comments, never could invent
So politick an instrument. Prior.

Proper gestures, and vehement exertions of the voice, are a kind of comment to what he utters. Addison's Spectator.

Still, with itself compar'd, his text peruse;
And let your comment be the Mantuan muse. Pope.

2. Remark; observation.

In such a time as this, it is not meet
That every nice offence should bear its comment. Shaksp.

Forgive the comment that my passion made
Upon thy feature; for my rage was blind. Shaksp.

In religion, scripture is the best rule; and the church's universal practice, the best commentary. King Charles.

2. Memoir; narrative in familiar manner.

Vere, in a private commentary which he wrote of that service, testified that eight hundred were slain. Bacon.

They shew still the ruins of Cæsar's wall, that reached eighteen miles in length, as he has declared it in the first book of his Commentaries. Addison on Italy.

COMMENTA'TOR, kŏm-mĕn-tā'tŭr.[521] n. s. [from comment.] Expositor; annotator.

I have made such expositions of my authors, as no commentator will forgive me. Dryden.

Some of the commentators tell us, that Marsya was a lawyer who had lost his cause. Addison on Italy.

Galen's commentator tells us, that bitter substances engender choler, and burn the blood. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

No commentator can more slily pass
O'er a learn'd unintelligible place. Pope.

CO'MMENTER, kŏm-mĕn'tŭr. n. s. [from comment.] One that writes comments; an explainer; an annotator.

Slily as any commenter goes by Hard words or sense. Donne.

COMMENTI'TIOUS, kŏm-mĕn-tĭsh'ŭs. adj. [commentitius, Lat.] Invented; fictitious; imaginary.

It is easy to draw a parallelism between that ancient and this modern nothing, and make good its resemblance to that commentitious inanity. Glanville's Scepsis.

CO'MMERCE, kŏm'mĕrse. n. s. [commercium, Lat. It was anciently accented on the last syllable.]

1. Intercourse; exchange of one thing for another; interchange of any thing; trade; traffick.

Places of publick resort being thus provided, our repair thither is especially for mutual conference, and, as it were, commerce to be had between God and us. Hooker.

How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
Peaceful commerce from dividable shores,
But by degrees stand in authentick place?
Shaksp. Troilus and Cressida.

Instructed ships shall sail to quick commerce,
By which remotest regions are ally'd;
Which makes one city of the universe,
Where some may gain, and all may be supply'd. Dryden.

These people had not any commerce with the other known parts of the world. Tillotson.

In any country, that hath commerce with the rest of the world, it is almost impossible now to be without the use of silver coin. Locke.

2. Common or familiar intercourse.

Good-nature, which consists in overlooking of faults, is to be exercised only in doing ourselves justice in the ordinary commerce and occurrences of life. Addison.

To CO'MMERCE, kŏm'mĕrse.[492] v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To traffick.

Ezekiel in the description of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with the East, as the only mart town, reciteth both the people with whom they commerce, and also what commodities every country yielded. Raleigh.

When they might not converse or commerce with any civil men; whither should they fly but into the woods and mountains, and there live in a wild manner. Sir J. Davies.

2. To hold intercourse with.

Come, but keep thy wonted state,
With even step and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
Thy wrapt soul sitting in thine eyes. Milton

COMME'RCIAL, kŏm-mĕr'shăl. adj. [from commerce.] Relating to commerce or traffick.

To CO'MMIGRATE, kŏm'mė-grāte. v. n. [con and migro, Lat.] To remove in a body, or by consent, from one country to another.

Blest are those,
Whose blood and judgment are so well commingled,
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger,
To sound what stop she please. Shaksp.

To COMMI'NGLE, kŏm-mĭng'gl. v. n. To unite one with another.

Dissolutions of gum tragacanth, and oil of sweet almonds do not commingle, the oil remaining on the top till they be stirred. Bacon's Physical Rem.

COMMINU'IBLE, kŏm-mĭn'ŭ-ė-bl. adj. [from comminute.] Frangible; reducible to powder; susceptible of pulverization.

The best diamonds are comminuible; and are so far from breaking hammers, that they submit unto pestilation, and resist not any ordinary pestle. Brown.

To CO'MMINUTE, kŏm-mė-nūte'. v. ă.

[comminuo, Lat.] To grind; to pulverize; to break into small parts.

Parchments, skins, and cloth, drink in liquors, though themselves be entire bodies, and not comminuted, as sand and ashes. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

COMMINU'TION, kôm-mê-nû'shûn. n. s. [from comminute.]

1. The act of grinding into small parts; pulverization.

The jaw in men, and animals furnished with grinders, hath an oblique or transverse motion, necessary for comminution of the meat. Ray on the Creation.

This smiting of the steel with the flint doth only make a comminution, and a very rapid whirling and melting of some particles; but that idea of flame is wholly in us. Bentley.

2. Attenuation.

Causes of fixation are the even spreading of the spirits and tangible parts, the closeness of the tangible parts, and the jejuneness or extreme comminution of spirits; of which the two first may be joined with a nature liquifiable. Bacon.

COMMI'SERABLE, kôm-mîz'êr-â-bl. adj. [from commiserate.] Worthy of compassion; pitiable; such as must excite sympathy or sorrow.

It is the sinfullest thing in the world to destitute a plantation once in forwardness: for besides the dishonour, it is the guiltiness of blood of many commiserable persons. Bacon's Essays.

This was the end of this noble and commiserable person, Edward, eldest son to the duke of Clarence. Bacon's Henry VII.

To COMMI'SERATE, kôm-mîz'êr-âte.[91] v. a. [con and miseror, Lat.] To pity; to look on with compassion; to compassionate.

COMMISERA'TION, kôm-mîz-êr-â'shûn. n. s. [from commiserate.] Pity; compassion; tenderness, or concern for another's pains.

These poor seduced creatures, whom I can neither speak nor think of but with much commiseration and pity. Hooker.

Live, and hereafter say
A mad man's mercy bade thee run away.
——I do defy thy commiseration,
And apprehend thee for a felon here.
Shaksp. Romeo and Juliet.

God knows with how much commiseration, and solicitous caution, I carried on that business, that I might neither encourage the rebels, nor discourage the protestants. King Charles.

She ended weeping; and her lovely plight
Immoveable, till peace, obtain'd from fault
Acknowledg'd and deplor'd, in Adam wrought Commiseration. Milton's Par. Lost.

From you their estate may expect effectual comfort; there are none from whom it may not deserve commiseration. Spratt.

No where fewer beggars appear to charm up commiseration, yet no where is there greater charity. Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

I prevailed with myself to go and see him, partly out of commiseration, and partly out of curiosity. Swift.

1. An officer made occasionally for a certain purpose; a delegate; a deputy.

2. It is a title of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, appertaining to such as exercises spiritual jurisdiction (at least so far as his commission permits) in places of the diocese so far distant from the chief city, as the chancellor cannot call the subjects. Cowell.

The commissaries of bishops have authority only in some certain place of the diocese, and in some certain causes of the jurisdiction limited to them by the bishop's commission. Ayliffe.

3. An officer who draws up lists of the numbers of an army, and regulates the procuration and conveyance of provision or ammunition.

But is it thus you English bards compose?
With Runick lays thus tag insipid prose?
And when you should your heroes deeds rehearse,
Give us a commissary's list in verse? Prior.

CO'MMISSARISHIP, kôm'mîs-sâr-ê-shîp. n. s. [from commissary.] The office of a commissary.

A commissariship is not grantable for life, so as to bind the succeeding bishop, though it should be confirmed by the dean and chapter. Ayliffe's Parergon.

COMMI'SSION, kôm-mîsh'ûn. n. s. [commissio, low Lat.]

1. The act of entrusting any thing.

2. A trust; a warrant by which any trust is held, or authority exercised.

Commission is the warrant, or letters patent, that all men exercising jurisdiction, either ordinary or extraordinary, have for their power. Cowell.

Omission to do what is necessary,
Seals a commission to a blank of danger. Shaksp.

The subjects grief
Comes through commissions, which compel from each
The sixth part of his substance, to be levied
Without delay. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

He led our powers;
Bore the commission of my place and person;
The which immediacy may well stand up,
And call itself your brother. Shaksp. King Lear.

He would have them fully acquainted with the nature and extent of their office, and so he joins commission with instruction: by one he conveys power, by the other knowledge. South.

3. A warrant by which a military officer is constituted.

Solyman, filled with the vain hope of the conquest of Persia, gave out his commissions into all parts of his empire, for the raising of a mighty army. Knolles's History of the Turks.

I was made a colonel; though I gained my commission by the horse's virtues, having leapt over a six-bar gate. Addison's Freeholder.

He for his son a gay commission buys,
Who drinks, whores, fights, and in a duel dies. Pope.

4. Charge; mandate; office; employment.

It was both a strange commission, and a strange obedience to a commission, for men, in the midst of their own blood, and being so furiously assailed, to hold their hands contrary to the laws of nature and necessity. Bacon's War with Spain.

Such commission from above
I have receiv'd, to answer thy desire
Of knowledge within bounds. Milton's Par. Lost.

At his command the storms invade;
The winds by his commission blow,
Till with a nod he bids them cease. Dryden.

He bore his great commission in his look;
But sweetly temper'd awe, and soften'd all he spoke. Dryden.

5. Act of committing a crime; perpetration. Sins of commission are distinguished in theology from sins of omission.

Every commission of sin introduces into the soul a certain degree of hardness. South's Sermons.

He indulges himself in the habit of known sin, whether commission of something which God hath forbidden, or the omission of something commanded. Rogers's Sermons.

6. A number of people joined in a trust or office.

7. The state of that which is entrusted to a number of joint officers; as the great seal was put into commission.

I have been considering, ever since my commitment, what it might be proper to deliver upon this occasion. Swift.

2. An order for sending to prison.

COMMI'TTEE, kôm-mît'tê. n. s. [from commit.]

Those to whom the consideration or ordering of any matter is referred, either by some court to whom it belongs, or by consent of parties. As in parliament, after a bill is read, it is either agreed to and passed, or not agreed to; or neither of these, but referred to the consideration of some appointed by the house to examine it farther, who thereupon are called a committee. Cowell.

Manchester had orders to march thither, having a committee of the parliament with him, as there was another committee of the Scottish parliament always in that army; there being also now a committee of both kingdoms residing at London for the carrying on the war. Clarendon.

All corners were filled with covenanters, confusion, committee men, and soldiers, serving each other to their ends of revenge, or power, or profit; and these committee men and soldiers were possest with this covenant. Walton.

COMMI'TTER, kôm-mît'tûr. n. s. [from commit.] Perpetrator; he that commits.

Such an one makes a man not only a partaker of other men's sins, but a deriver of the whole guilt to himself; yet so as to leave the committer as full of guilt as before. South.

COMMI'TTIBLE, kôm-mît'tâ-bl. adj. [from commit.] Liable to be committed.

Besides the mistakes committible in the solary compute, the difference of chronology disturbs his computes. Brown.

To COMMI'X, kôm-mîks'. v. a. [commisceo, Lat.] To mingle; to blend; to mix; to unite with things in one mass.

A dram of gold dissolved in aqua regia, with a dram of copper in aqua fortis commixed, gave a great colour. Bacon.

I have written against the spontaneous generation of frogs in the clouds; or, on the earth, out of dust and rain water commixed. Ray.

It is manifest, by this experiment, that the commixed impressions of all the colours do stir up and beget a sensation of white; that is, that whiteness is compounded of all the colours. Newton.

COMMI'XION, kôm-mîk'shûn. n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation of different ingredients.

Were thy commixion Greek and Trojan, so
That thou could'st say, this hand is Grecian all,
And this is Trojan. Shaksp. Troilus and Cressida.

COMMI'XTION, kôm-mîk'shûn. n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation; union of various substances in one mass.

Some species there be of middle and participating natures, that is, of birds and beasts, as batts, and some few others, so conformed and set together, that we cannot define the beginning or end of either; there being a commixtion of both in the whole, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

COMMI'XTURE, kôm-mîks'tshûre.[291] n. s. [from commix.]

1. The act of mingling; the state of being mingled; incorporation; union in one mass.

In the commixture of any thing that is more oily or sweet, such bodies are least apt to putrefy, the air working little upon them. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

2. The mass formed by mingling different things; composition; compound,

Fair ladies, mask'd, are roses in the bud,
Or angels veil'd in clouds; are roses blown,
Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shewn. Shaksp.

My love and fear glew'd many friends to thee;
And now I fall, thy tough commixtures melt,
Impairing Henry, strength'ning misproud York. Shaksp.

There is scarcely any rising but by a commixture of good and evil arts. Bacon.

All the circumstances and respect of religion and state intermixed together in their commixture, will better become a royal history, or a council-table, than a single life. Wotton.

COMMO'DE, kôm-môde'. n. s. [Fr.] The head-dress of women.

Let them reflect how they would be affected, should they meet with a man on horseback, in his breeches and jack-boots, dressed up in a commode and a nightrail. Spectator.

She has contrived to shew her principles by the setting of her commode; so that it will be impossible for any woman that is dissaffected to be in the fashion. Addison's Freeholder.

She, like some pensive statesman, walks demure,
And smiles, and hugs, to make destruction sure;
Or under high commodes, with looks erect,
Barefac'd devours, in gaudy colours deck'd. Granville.

COMMO'DIOUS, kôm-mô'dê-ûs, or, kôm-mô'jê-ûs.[293 294] adj. [commodus, Lat.]

1. Convenient; suitable; accommodate to any purpose; fit; proper; free from hindrance or uneasiness.

Such a place cannot be commodious to live in; for being so near the moon, it had been too near the sun. Raleigh's History.

To that recess, commodious for surprize,
When purple light shall next suffuse the skies,
With me repair. Pope's Odyssey.

2. Useful; suited to wants or necessities.

If they think we ought to prove the ceremonies commodious, they do greatly deceive themselves. Hooker.

Bacchus had found out the making of wine, and many things else commodious for mankind. Raleigh's History of the World.

The gods have done their part,
By sending this commodious plague. Dryd. Oedipus.

Maro's muse,
Thrice sacred muse, commodious precepts gives,
Instructive to the swains. Philips.

COMMO'DIOUSLY, kôm-mô'dê-ûs-lê. adv. [from commodious.]

It would be ridiculous to grow old in the study of every necessary thing, in an art which comprehends so many several parts. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

2. To contain in the mind; to understand; to conceive.
Rome was not better by her Horace taught,
Than we are here to comprehend his thought. Waller.
'Tis unjust, that they who have not the least notion of heroick writing, should therefore condemn the pleasure which others receive from it, because they cannot comprehend it. Dryden.

COMPREHE'NSIBLE, kôm-prê-hên'sê-bl. adj. [comprehensible, Fr. comprehensibilis, Lat.]

1. Intelligible; attainable by the mind; conceivable by the understanding.
The horizon sets the bounds between the enlightened and dark parts of things, between what is and what is not comprehensible by us. Locke.

2. Possible to be comprised.
Lest this part of knowledge should seem to any not comprehensible by axiom, we will set down some heads of it. Bacon.

COMPREHE'NSIBLY, kôm-prê-hên'sê-blê. adv. [from comprehensible.] With great power of signification or understanding; significantly; with great extent of sense. Tillotson seems to have used comprehensibly for comprehensively.
The words wisdom and righteousness are commonly used very comprehensibly, so as to signify all religion and virtue. Tillotson.

COMPREHE'NSION, kôm-prê-hên'shûn. n. s. [comprehensio, Lat.]

1. The act or quality of comprising or containing; inclusion.

In the Old Testament there is a close comprehension of the New, in the New an open discovery of the Old. Hooker.

The comprehension of an idea, regards all essential modes and properties of it; so body, in its comprehension, takes in solidity, figure, quantity, mobility. Watts's Logick.

2. Summary; epitome; compendium; abstract; abridgment in which much is comprised.

If we would draw a short abstract of human happiness, bring together all the various ingredients of it, and digest them into one prescription, we must at last fix on this wise and religious aphorism in my text, as the sum and comprehension of all. Rogers.

3. Knowledge; capacity; power of the mind to admit and contain many ideas at once.

You give no proof of decay of your judgment, and comprehension of all things, within the compass of an human understanding. Dryden.

4. [In rhetorick.] A trope or figure; by which the name of a whole is put for a part, or that of a part for the whole, or a definite number for an indefinite. Harris.

COMPREHE'NSIVE, kôm-prê-hên'sîv. adj. [from comprehend.]

1. Having the power to comprehend or understand many things at once.

He must have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury Tales the various manners and humours of the whole English nation in his age; not a single character has escaped him. Dryden's Fables, Preface.

His hand unstain'd, his uncorrupted heart,
His comprehensive head; all interests weigh'd,
All Europe sav'd, yet Britain not betray'd. Pope.

2. Having the quality of comprising much; compendious; extensive.

So diffusive, so comprehensive, so catholick a grace is charity, that whatever time is the opportunity of any other virtue, that time is the opportunity of charity. Spratt's Sermons.

COMPREHE'NSIVELY, kôm-prê-hên'sîv-lê. adv. [from comprehensive.] In a comprehensive manner.

COMPREHE'NSIVENESS, kôm-prê-hên'sîv-nês. n. s. [from comprehensive.] The quality of including much in a few words or narrow compass.

1. To force into a narrower compass; to squeeze together.

2. To embrace.

Her Neptune eyed, with bloom of beauty blest,
And in his cave the yielding nymph comprest.
Pope's Odyssey.

There was in the island of Io, a young girl compressed by a genius, who delighted to associate with the muses. Pope.

CO'MPRESS, kôm'prês.[482] n. s. [from the verb.] Bolsters of linen, by which surgeons suit their bandages for any particular part or purpose. Quincy.

I applied an intercipient about the ankle and upper part of the foot, and by compress and bandage dressed it up. Wiseman.

COMPRESSIBI'LITY, kôm-prês-sê-bîl'lê-tê. n. s. [from compressible.] The quality of being compressible; the quality of admitting to be brought by force into a narrower compass; as air may be compressed, but water can by no violence be reduced to less space than it naturally occupies.

COMPRE'SSIBLE, kôm-prês'sê-bl. adj. [from compress.] Capable of being forced into a narrower compass; yielding to pressure, so as that one part is brought nearer to another.

Their being spiral particles, accounts for the elasticity of air; their being spherical particles, which gives free passage to any heterogeneous matter, accounts for air's being compressible. Cheyne.

COMPRE'SSIBLENESS, kôm-prês'sê-bl-nês. n. s. [from compressible.] Capability of being pressed close. Dict.

COMPRE'SSION, kôm-prêsh'ûn. n. s. [compressio, Lat.] The act of bringing the parts of any body more near to each other by violence; the quality of admitting such an effort of force as may compel the body compressed into a narrower space.

Whenever a solid body is pressed, there is an inward tumult in the parts, seeking to deliver themselves from the compression; and this is the cause of all violent motion. Bacon.

The powder in shot, being dilated into such a flame as endureth not compression, moveth in round, the flame being in the nature of a liquid body, sometimes recoiling. Bacon.

Tears are the effects of the compression of the moisture of the brain, upon dilatation of the spirits. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

Merry Michael, the Cornish poet, piped this upon his oaten pipe for merry England, but with a mocking compression for Normandy. Camd. Rem.

He that shall find out an hypothesis, by which water may be so rare, and yet not be capable of compression by force, may doubtless, by the same hypothesis, make gold and water, and all other bodies, as much rarer as he pleases; so that light may find a ready passage through transparent substances. Newton.

COMPRE'SSURE, kôm-prêsh'shûre.[462] n. s. [from compress.] The act or force of one body pressing against another.

We tried whether heat would, notwithstanding so forcible a compressure, dilate it. Boyle.

To COMPRI'NT, kôm-prînt'. v. n. [comprimere, Lat.]

To print together; it is commonly taken, in law, for the deceitful printing of another's copy, or book, to the prejudice of the rightful proprietor. Phillips's World of Words.

To COMPRI'SE, kôm-prize'. v. a. [comprendre, compris, Fr.] To contain; to comprehend; to include.

Necessity of shortness causeth men to cut off impertinent discourses, and to comprise much matter in a few words. Hooker.

Do they not, under doctrine, comprehend the same that we intend by matters of faith? Do not they, under discipline, comprise the regimen of the church? Hooker.

'Tis the polluted love that multiplies;
But friendship does two souls in one comprise.
Roscommon.

COMPROBA'TION, kôm-prô-bâ'shûn. n. s. [comprobo, Lat.] Proof; attestation.

That is only esteemed a legal testimony, which receives comprobation from the mouths of at least two witnesses. Brown.

CO'MPROMISE, kôm-prô-mize. n. s. [compromissum, Lat.]

1. Compromise is a mutual promise of two or more parties at difference, to refer the ending of their controversies to the arbitrement or equity of one or more arbitrators. Cowell.

2. A compact or bargain, in which some concessions are made on each side.

Wars have not wasted it, for warr'd he hath not;
But basely yielded, upon compromise,
That which his ancestors atchiev'd with blows.
Shakspeare.

To CO'MPROMISE, kôm'prô-mize. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To compound; to adjust a compact by mutual concessions: as, they compromised the affair at a middle rate.

2. In Shakspeare it means, unusually, to accord; to agree.

Laban and himself were compromis'd,
That all the yearlings, which were streak'd and pied,
Should fall as Jacob's hire. Shakspeare.

COMPROMISSO'RIAL, kôm-prô-mîs-sô'rê-âl. adj. [from compromise.] Relating to a compromise.

COMPROVI'NCIAL, kôm-prô-vîn'shâl. n. s. [from con and provincial.] Belonging to the same province.

COMPU'LSATORY, kŏm-pŭl'sā-tŭr-ē.[512] adj. [from compulsor, Lat.] Having the force of compelling; coactive.

Which is no other,
But to recover from us by strong hand,
And terms compulsatory, those foresaid lands,
So by his father lost. Shakspeare.

COMPU'LSION, kŏm-pŭl'shŭn. n. s. [compulsio, Lat.]

1. The act of compelling to something; force; violence of the agent.

If reasons were as plenty as blackberries, I would give no man a reason on compulsion. Shakspeare.

Thoughts, whither have ye led me? with that sweet
Compulsion thus transported! Milton's Par. Lost.

Such sweet compulsion doth in musick lie,
To lull the daughters of necessity. Milton.

2. The state of being compelled; violence suffered.

Compulsion is in an agent capable of volition, when the beginning or continuation of any action is contrary to the preference of his mind. Locke.

When the fierce foe hung on our broken rear,
With what compulsion and laborious flight,
We sunk thus low! Milton's Par. Lost.

This faculty is free from compulsion, and so spontaneous, and free from determination by the particular object. Hale.

Possibly there were others who assisted Harold, partly out of fear and compulsion. Hale.

COMPU'LSIVE, kŏm-pŭl'sĭv. adj. [from compulser, Fr compulsus, Lat.] Having the power to compel; forcible.

The Danube, vast and deep,
Supreme of rivers! to the frightful brink,
Urg'd by compulsive arms, soon as they reach'd
New terror chill'd their veins. Philips.

The clergy would be glad to recover their dues by a more short and compulsive method. Swift.

COMPU'LSIVELY, kŏm-pŭl'sĭv-lē. adv. [from compulsive.] By force; by violence.

COMPU'LSIVENESS, kŏm-pŭl'sĭv-nĕs. n. s. [from compulsive.] Force; compulsion.

CONCE'ALMENT, kŏn-sēle'mĕnt. n.s. [from conceal.]

1. The act of hiding; secrecy.

She never told her love;
But let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud,
Feed on her damask cheek. Shakspeare.

He is a worthy gentleman,
Exceedingly well read, and profited
In strange concealments. Shakspeare.

Few own such sentiments; yet this concealment derives rather from the fear of man than of any Being above. Glanville.

2. The state of being hid; privacy; detestescence.

A person of great abilities is zealous for the good of mankind, and as solicitous for the concealment as the performance of illustrious actions. Addison.

3. Hiding-place; retreat; cover; shelter.

The choice of this holy name, as the most effectual concealment of a wicked design, supposes mankind satisfied that nothing but what is just is directed by the principles of it. Rogers.

The cleft tree
Offers its kind concealment to a few,
Their food its insects, and its moss their nests. Thomson.

To CONCE'DE, kŏn-sēde'. v. a. [concedo, Lat.] To yield; to admit; to grant; to let pass undisputed.

By expurgatory animadversions we might strike out great numbers of hidden qualities; and, having once a conceded list, we might with more safety attempt their reasons. Brown.

This must not be conceded without limitation. Boyle.

The atheist, if you concede to him that fortune may be an agent, doth presume himself safe and invulnerable. Bentley.

CONCE'IT, kŏn-sēte'. n. s. [conceit, Fr. conceptus, Lat.]

1. Conception; thought; idea; image in the mind.

Here the very shepherds have their fancies lifted to so high conceits, as the learned of other nations are content both to borrow their names, and imitate their cunning. Sidney.

Impossible it was, that ever their will should change or incline to remit any part of their duty, without some object having force to avert their conceit from God. Hooker.

His grace looks cheerfully and smooth this morning:
There 's some conceit, or other, likes him well,
When that he bids good-morrow with such spirit. Shakspeare.

In laughing there ever precedeth a conceit of somewhat ridiculous, and therefore it is proper to man. Bacon.

2. Understanding; readiness of apprehension.

How often, alas! did her eyes say unto me, that they loved! and yet I, not looking for such a matter, had not my conceit open to understand them. Sidney.

The first kind of things appointed by laws humane, containeth whatsoever is good or evil, is notwithstanding more secret than that it can be discerned by every man's present conceit, without some deeper discourse and judgment. Hooker.

I shall be found of a quick conceit in judgment, and shall be admired. Wisdom, viii. 11.

3. Opinion, generally in a sense of contempt; fancy; imagination; fantastical notion.

I know not how conceit may rob
The treasury of life, when life itself
Yields to the theft. Shakspeare.

Strong conceit, like a new principle, carries all easily with it, when yet above common sense. Locke.

Malbranche has an odd conceit,
As ever enter'd Frenchman's pate. Prior.

4. Opinion, in a neutral sense.

Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit?
There is more hope of a fool than of him. Proverbs.

I shall not fail t' approve the fair conceit
The king hath of you. Shakspeare.

5. Pleasant fancy; gayety of imagination; acuteness.

His wit is as thick as Tewksbury mustard: there is no more conceit in him than is in a mallet. Shak.

While he was on his way to the globet, a freak took him in the head to go off with a conceit. L'Estrange.

6. Sentiment, as distinguished from imagery.

Some to conceit alone their works confine,
And glitt'ring thoughts struck out at ev'ry line. Pope.

7. Fondness; favourable opinion; opinionative pride.

Since by a little studying in learning, and great conceit of himself, he has lost his religion; may he find it again by harder study, under humbler truth. Bentley.

8. Out of Conceit with. No longer fond of.

Not that I dare assume to myself to have put him out of conceit with it, by having convinced him of the fantasticalness of it. Tillotson.

What hath chiefly put me out of conceit with this moving manner, is the frequent disappointment. Swift.

To CONCE'IT, kŏn-sēte'. v. a. [from the noun.] To conceive; to imagine; to think; to believe.

One of two bad ways you must conceit me,
Either a coward, or a flatterer. Shakspeare.

They looked for great matters at their hands, in a cause which they conceited to be for the liberty of the subject. Bacon.

He conceits himself to be struck at, when he is not so much as thought of. L'Estrange.

The strong, by conceiting themselves weak, are thereby rendered as unactive, and consequently as useless, as if they really were so. South's Sermons.

CONCE'ITED, kŏn-sē'tĕd. part. adj. [from conceit.]

1. Endowed with fancy.

He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, active of body, pleasantly conceited, and sharp of wit. Knolles.

2. Proud; fond of himself; opinionative; affected; fantastical.

There is another extreme in obscure writers, which some empty conceited heads are apt to run into, out of a prodigality of words, and a want of sense. Felton on the Classicks.

If you think me too conceited,
Or to passion quickly heated. Swift.

What you write of me, would make me more conceited than what I scribble myself. Pope.

3. With of before the object of conceit.

Every man is building a several way, impotently conceited of his own model and his own materials. Dryden.

If we consider how vitious and corrupt the Athenians were, how conceited of their own wit, science, and politeness. Bentley.

CONCE'ITEDLY, kŏn-sē'tĕd-lē. adv. [from conceited.] Fancifully; whimsically.

Conceitedly dress her, and be assign'd
By you fit place for every flower and jewel:
Make her for love fit fuel. Donne.

CONCE'ITEDNESS, kŏn-sē'tĕd-nĕs. n. s. [from conceited.] Pride; opinionativeness; fondness of himself.

When men think none worthy esteem, but such as claim under their own pretences, partiality and conceitedness make them give the pre-eminence. Collier on Pride.

CONCE'ITLESS, kŏn-sēte'lĕs. adj. [from conceit.] Stupid; without thought; dull of apprehension.

Think'st thou I am so shallow, so conceitless,
To be seduced by thy flattery. Shakspeare.

CONCE'IVABLE, kŏn-sē'vā-bl. adj. [from conceive.]

1. That may be imagined or thought.

If it were possible to contrive an invention, whereby any conceivable weight may be moved by any conceivable power, with the same quickness, without other instrument, the works of nature would be too much subject to art. Wilkins.

2. That may be understood or believed.

The freezing of the words in the air, in the Northern climes, is as conceivable as this strange union. Glanville.

It is not conceivable, that it should be indeed that very person, whose shape and voice it assumed. Atterbury's Sermons.

CONCE'IVABLENESS, kŏn-sē'vâ-bl-nĕs. n.s. [from conceivable.] The quality of being conceivable. Dict.

CONCE'IVABLY, kŏn-sē'vâ-blē. adv. [from conceivable.] In a conceivable or intelligible manner.

2. To form in the mind; to imagine.

Nebuchadnezzar hath conceived a purpose against you. Jeremiah.

This man conceived the duke's death; but what was the motive of that felonious conception, is in the clouds. Wotton.

3. To comprehend; to understand: as, he conceives the whole system.

This kiss, if it durst speak,
Would stretch thy spirits up into the air:
Conceive, and fare thee well. Shakspeare.

4. To think; to be of opinion.

If you compare my gentleman with Sir John, you will hardly conceive him to have been bred in the same climate. Swift.

To CONCE'IVE, kŏn-sēve'. v. n.

1. To think; to have an idea of.

The griev'd commons
Hardly conceive of me: let it be nois'd,
That, through our intercession, this revokement
And pardon comes. Shakspeare.

O what avails me now that honour high,
To have conceiv'd of God! or that salute,
Hail, highly favour'd, among women blest! Milton.

Conceive of things clearly and distinctly in their own natures; conceive of things completely in all their parts; conceive of things comprehensively in all their properties and relations; conceive of things extensively in all their kinds; conceive of things orderly, or in a proper method. Watts.

2. To become pregnant.

The flocks should conceive when they came to drink. Genesis.

The beauteous maid, whom he beheld, possess'd:
Conceiving as she slept, her fruitful womb
Swell'd with the founder of immortal Rome. Addis.

CONCE'IVER, kŏn-sē'vŭr. n. s. [from conceive.] One that understands or apprehends.

Though hereof prudent symbols and pious allegories be made by wiser conceivers, yet common heads will fly unto superstitious applications. Brown.

CONCE'NT, kŏn-sĕnt'. n. s. [concentus, Lat.]

1. Concert of voices; harmony; concord of sound.

It is to be considered, that whatsoever virtue is in numbers, for conducing to concent of notes, is rather to be ascribed to the ante-number than to the entire number. Bacon.

2. Consistency.

Reasons borrowed from nature and the schoolmen, as subservient mediums, carry a musick and concent to that which God hath said in his word. Dr. Maine.

'Tis in concent to his own principles, which allow no merit, no intrinsick worth, to accompany one state more than another. Atterbury.

To CONCE'NTRATE, kŏn-sĕn'trāte.[91] v. a. [concentrer, Fr. from con and centrum, Lat.] To drive into a narrow compass; to drive towards the centre: contrary to expand or dilate.

CONCENTRA'TION, kŏn-sĕn-trā'shŭn. n. s. [from concentrate.] Collection into a narrow space round the centre; compression into a narrow compass.

All circular bodies, that receive a concentration of the light, must be shadowed in a circular manner. Peacham on Drawing.

To CONCE'NTRE, kŏn-sĕn'tŭr. v. n. [concentrer, Fr. from con and centrum, Lat.] To tend to one common centre; to have the same centre with something else.

The bricks having first been formed in a circular mould, and then cut, before their burning, into four quarters or more, the sides afterwards join so closely, and the points concentre so exactly, that the pillars appear one intire piece. Wotton.

All these are like so many lines drawn from several objects, that some way relate to him, and concentre in him. Hale.

To CONCE'NTRE, kŏn-sĕn'tŭr. v. a. To direct or contract towards one centre.

The having a part less to animate, will serve to concentre the spirits, and make them more active in the rest. Decay of Piety.

In thee concentring all their precious beams
Of sacred influence! Milton.

CONCE'NTRICAL, kŏn-sĕn'trĕ-kâl. } adj.
CONCE'NTRICK, kŏn-sĕn'trĭk. } [concentricus, Lat.] Having one common centre.

If, as in water stirr'd, more circles be
Produc'd by one, love such additions take;
Those, like so many spheres, but one heav'n make;
For they are all concentrick unto thee. Donne.

Any substance, pitched steddy upon two points, as on an axis, and moving about on that axis, also describes a circle concentrick to the axis. Moxon.

If the crystalline humour had been concentrical to the sclerodes, the eye would not have admitted a whole hemisphere at one view. Ray on the Creation.

If a stone be thrown into stagnating water, the waves excited thereby continue some time to arise in the place where the stone fell into the water, and are propagated from thence into concentrick circles upon the surface of the water to great distances. Newton.

The manner of its concretion is by concentrical rings, like those of an onion about the first kernel. Arbuthnot on Diet.

Circular revolutions in concentrick orbs about the sun, or other central body, could in no wise be attained without the power of the Divine arm. Bentley.

CONCE'PTACLE, kŏn-sĕp'tâ-kl.[405] n.s. [conceptaculum, Lat.] That in which any thing is contained; a vessel.

There is at this day resident, in that huge conceptacle, water enough to effect such a deluge. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

CONCE'PTIBLE, kŏn-sĕp'tĕ-bl. adj. [from concipio, conceptum, Lat.] That may be conceived; intelligible; capable to be understood.

Some of his attributes, and the manifestations thereof, are not only highly delectable to the intellective faculty, but are most suitable and easily conceptible by us, because apparent in his works. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

CONCE'PTION, kŏn-sĕp'shŭn. n.s. [conceptio, Lat.]

1. The act of conceiving, or growing quick with pregnancy.

I will greatly multiply thy sorrow by thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children. Genesis, iii. 16.

Thy sorrow I will greatly multiply
By thy conception; children thou shalt bring
In sorrow forth. Milton's Paradise Lost.

2. The state of being conceived.

Joy had the like conception in our eyes,
And, at that instant, like a babe sprung up. Shak.

Our own productions flatter us: it is impossible not to be fond of them at the moment of their conception. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

3. Notion; idea; image in the mind.

As conceptions are the images or resemblances of things to the mind within itself, in the like manner are words or names the marks, tokens, or resemblances of those conceptions to the minds of them whom we converse with. South.

Consult the acutest poets and speakers, and they will confess that their quickest, most admired conceptions, were such as darted into their minds, like sudden flashes of lightning, they knew not how, nor whence; and not by any certain consequence, or dependence of one thought upon another, as it is in matters of ratiocination. South.

To have right conceptions about them, we must bring our understandings to the inflexible natures and unalterable relations of things, and not endeavour to bring things to any preconceived notions of our own. Locke.

4. Sentiments; purpose.

Thou but remember'st me of my own conception.
I have perceived a most faint neglect of late; which I have rather blamed as my own jealous curiosity, than as a very pretence and purpose of unkindness. Shakspeare's King Lear.

Please your highness, note
His dangerous conception in this point:
Not friended by his wish to your high person,
His will is most malignant, and it stretches
Beyond you to your friends. Shakspeare.

5. Apprehension; knowledge.

And as if beasts conceiv'd what reason were,
And that conception should distinctly show
They should the name of reasonable bear;
For, without reason, none could reason know. Davies.

6. Conceit; sentiment; pointed thought.

He is too flatulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry; many times unequal, and almost always forced; and, besides, is full of conceptions, points of epigram, and witticisms; all which are not only below the dignity of heroick verse, but contrary to its nature. Dryden.

CONCE'PTIOUS, kŏn-sĕp'shŭs. adj. [conceptum, Lat.] Apt to conceive; fruitful; pregnant.

Common mother,
Ensear thy fertile and conceptious womb;
Let it no more bring out to ingrateful man. Shaksp.

CONCE'PTIVE, kŏn-sĕp'tĭv. adj. [conceptum, Lat.] Capable to conceive.

In hot climates, and where the uterine parts exceed in heat, by the coldness of this simple they may be reduced into a conceptive constitution. Brown.

To CONCE'RN, kŏn-sĕrn'. v. a. [concerner, Fr. concerno, low Lat.]

1. To relate to; to belong to.

Exclude the use of natural reasoning about the sense of holy scripture, concerning the articles of our faith; and then, that the scripture doth concern the articles of our faith, who can assure us? Hooker.

Count Claudio may hear; for what I would speak of concerns him. Shakspeare.

Gracious things
Thou hast reveal'd; those chiefly which concern
Just Abraham, and his seed. Milton's Par. Lost.

This place concerns not at all the dominion of one brother over the other. Locke.

2. To affect with some passion; to touch nearly; to be of importance to.

I would not
The cause were known to them it most concerns.

Our wars with France have affected us in our most tender interests, and concerned us more than those with any other nation. Addison.

It much concerns them not to suffer the king to establish his authority on this side. Addison on Italy.

The more the authority of any station in society is extended, the more it concerns publick happiness that it be committed to men fearing God. Rogers.

3. To interest; to engage by interest.

I knew a young negroe who was sick of the small-pox: I found by enquiry, at a person's concerned for him, that the little tumours left whitish specks behind them. Boyle.

Concern'd for each; here Venus, Juno there.
Dryden.

Providence, where it loves a nation, concerns itself to own and assert the interest of religion, by blasting the spoilers of religious persons and places. South.

Whatever past actions it cannot reconcile, or appropriate to that present self by consciousness, it can be no more concerned in than if they had never been done. Locke.

They think themselves out of the reach of providence, and no longer concerned to solicit his favour. Rogers.

4. To disturb; to make uneasy.

In one compressing engine I shut a sparrow, without forcing any air in; and in an hour the bird began to pant, and be concerned, and in less than an hour and a half to be sick. Derham.

5. To concern himself. To intermeddle; to be busy.

Being a layman, I ought not to have concerned myself with speculations which belong to the profession. Dryden.

CONCE'RN, kôn-sêrn'. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Business; affair: considered as relating to some one.

Let early care thy main concerns secure,
Things of less moment may delays endure. Denham.

This manner of exposing the private concerns of families, and sacrificing the secrets of the dead to the curiosity of the living, is one of those licentious practices, which might well deserve the animadversion of our government. Addison.

A Heathen emperor said, if the gods were offended, it was their own concern, and they were able to vindicate themselves. Swift.

Religion is no trifling concern, to be performed in any careless and superficial manner. Rogers.

2. Interest; engagement.

No plots th' alarm to his retirements give;
'Tis all mankind's concern that he should live.
Dryden.

When we speak of the conflagration of the world, these have no concern in the question. Burnet.

3. Importance; moment.

Mysterious secrets of a high concern,
And weighty truths, solid convincing sense,
Explain'd by unaffected eloquence. Roscommon.

The mind is stunned and dazzled amidst that variety of objects: she cannot apply herself to those things which are of the utmost concern to her. Addison.

4. Passion; affection; regard.

Ah, what concerns did both your souls divide!
Your honour gave us what your love denied. Dryd.

O Marcia, let me hope thy kind concerns,
And gentle wishes, follow me to battle.
Addison's Cato.

Why all this concern for the poor? We want them not, as the country is now managed: where the plough has no work, one family can do the business of fifty. Swift.

CONCE'RNEDLY, kôn-sêrn'êd-lê. adv. [from concern.] With affection; with interest.

They had more positively and concernedly wedded his cause, than they were before understood to have done. Clarendon.

CONCE'RNING, kôn-sêr'nîng. prep. [from concern: this word, originally a participle, has before a noun the force of a preposition.] Relating to; with relation to.

There is not any thing more subject to errour, than the true judgment concerning the power and forces of an estate. Bacon.

The ancients had no higher recourse than to nature, as may appear by a discourse concerning this point in Strabo. Brown.

None can demonstrate that there is such an island as Jamaica; yet, upon testimony, I am free from all doubt concerning it. Tillotson, Preface.

CONCE'RNMENT, kôn-sêrn'mênt. n. s. [from concern.]

1. The thing in which we are concerned or interested; affair; business; interest.

To mix with thy concernments I desist
Henceforth, nor too much disapprove my own.
Milton's Agonistes.

This shews how useful you have been,
To bring the king's concernments in. Hudibras.

Yet when we're sick, the doctor's fetcht in haste,
Leaving our great concernment to the last. Denham.

When my concernment takes up no more room or compass than myself, then, so long as I know where to breathe and to exist, I know also where to be happy. South.

He that is wise in the affairs and concernments of other men, but careless and negligent of his own, that man may be said to be busy, but he is not wise. Tillotson.

Our spiritual interests, and the great concernments of a future state, would doubtless recur often. Atterbury.

Propositions which extend only to the present life, are small, compared with those that have influence upon our everlasting concernments. Watts on the Mind.

2. Relation; influence.

Sir, 'tis of near concernment, and imports
No less than the king's life and honour.
Denham's Sophy.

He justly fears a peace with me would prove
Of ill concernment to his haughty love.
Dryden's Indian Emperor.

3. Intercourse; business.

The great concernment of men is with men, one amongst another. Locke.

4. Importance; moment.

I look upon experimental truths as matters of great concernment to mankind. Boyle.

5. Interposition; regard; meddling.

He married a daughter to the earl, without any other approbation of her father, or concernment in it, than suffering him and her to come into his presence. Clarendon.

6. Passion; emotion of mind.

While they are so eager to destroy the fame of others, their ambition is manifest in their concernment. Dryden.

If it carry with it the notion of something extraordinary, if apprehension and concernment accompany it, the idea is likely to sink the deeper. Locke.

CONCLU'SION, kôn-klû'zhûn. n. s. [from conclude.]

1. Determination; final decision.

Ways of peaceable conclusion there are but these two certain; the one a sentence of judicial decision, given by authority thereto appointed within ourselves; the other, the like kind of sentence given by a more universal authority. Hooker.

2. The collection from propositions premised; the consequence.

The conclusion of experience, from the time past to the time present, will not be sound and perfect.

Bacon's War with Spain.

And marrying divers principles and grounds,
Out of their match a true conclusion brings. Davies.
Then doth the wit
Build fond conclusions on those idle grounds;
Then doth it fly the good, and ill pursue. Davies.
I only deal by rules of art,
Such as are lawful, and judge by Conclusions of astrology. Hudibras.

It is of the nature of principles, to yield a conclusion different from themselves. Tillotson.

He granted him both the major and the minor; but denied him the conclusion. Addison's Freeholder.

3. The close; the last result of argumentative deduction.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. Eccles. xii. 13.

I have been reasoning, and in conclusion have thought it best to return to what fortune hath made my home. Swift.

4. The event of experiments; experiment.

Her physician tells me,
She has pursued conclusions infinite
Of easy ways to die. Shak. Antony and Cleopatra.

We practise likewise all conclusions of grafting and inoculating, as well of wild trees as fruit trees.

Bacon's New Atlantis.

5. The end; the last part.

I can speak no longer; yet I will strain myself to breathe out this one invocation, which shall be my conclusion. Howel.

6. In Shakspeare it seems to signify silence; confinement of the thoughts.

Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes
And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour,
Demuring upon me. Shak. Antony and Cleopatra.

CONCLU'SIVE, kôn-klû'sîv.[168 428] adj. [from conclude.]

1. Decisive; giving the last determination to the opinion.

The agreeing votes of both houses were not by any law or reason conclusive to my judgment.

King Charles.

The last dictate of the understanding is not always absolute in itself, nor conclusive to the will, yet it produces no antecedent nor external necessity.

Bramhall's Answer to Hobbes.

They have secret reasons for what they seem to do, which, whatsoever they are, they must be equally conclusive for us as they were for them. Rogers.

2. Regularly consequential.

Those that are not men of art, not knowing the true forms of syllogism, cannot know whether they are made in right and conclusive modes and figures.

Locke.

CONCLU'SIVELY, kôn-klû'sîv-lè. adv. [from conclusive.] Decisively; with final determination.

This I speak only to desire Eupolis not to speak peremptorily, or conclusively, touching the point of possibility, till they have heard me deduce the means of the execution. Bacon.

CONCLU'SIVENESS, kôn-klû'sîv-nès. n. s. [from conclusive.] Power of determining the opinion; regular consequence.

Consideration of things to be known, of their several weights, conclusiveness, or evidence.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

To CONCOA'GULATE, kông-kô-âg'gû-lâte.

[408] v. a. [from con and coagulate.] To curdle or congeal one thing with another.

The saline parts of those, upon their solution by the rain, may work upon those other substances, formerly concoagulated with them. Boyle.

They do but coagulate themselves, without concoagulating with them any water.

Boyle's History of Firmness.

CONCOAGULA'TION, kŏng-kŏ-ăg-gû-lā'shŭn. n. s. [from concoagulate.] A coagulation by which different bodies are joined in one mass.

To CONCO'CT, kŏn-kŏkt'. v. a. [concoquo, Lat.]

1. To digest by the stomach, so as to turn food to nutriment.

The working of purging medicines cometh two or three hours after the medicines taken; for that the stomach first maketh a proof, whether it can concoct them. Bacon.

Assuredly he was a man of a feeble stomach, unable to concoct any great fortune, prosperous or adverse. Hayward.

The vital functions are performed by general and constant laws; the food is concocted, the heart beats, the blood circulates, the lungs play.

Cheyne's Philosophical Principles.

The notions and sentiments of others judgment, as well as of our own memory, makes our property: it does, as it were, concoct our intellectual food, and turns it into a part of ourselves. Watts on the Mind.

2. To purify or sublime by heat; to heighten to perfection.

The small close-lurking minister of fate,
Whose high concocted venom through the veins
A rapid lightning darts. Thomson's Summer.

3. To ripen.

The root which continueth ever in the earth, is still concocted by the earth; and fruits and grains are half a year in concocting, whereas leaves are out and perfect in a month. Bacon.

CONCO'CTION, kŏn-kŏk'shŭn. n. s. [from concoct.] Digestion in the stomach; maturation by heat; the acceleration of any thing toward purity and perfection.

This hard rolling is between concoction and a simple maturation. Bacon's Natural History.

The constantest notion of concoction is, that it should signify the degrees of alteration of one body into another, from crudity to perfect concoction, which is the ultimity of that action or process.

Bacon's Natural History.

He, though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same,
Might thence a new concoction take,
And part far purer than he came. Donne.

CONCO'LOUR, kŏn-kŭl'lŭr. adj. [concolor, Lat.] Of one colour; without variety.

In concolour animals, and such as are confined unto the same colour, we measure not their beauty thereby; for if a crow or blackbird grow white, we account it more pretty. Brown.

CONCO'MITANCE, kŏn-kŏm'ĕ-tănse. } n. s.
CONCO'MITANCY, kŏn-kŏm'ĕ-tăn-sĕ. }

[from concomitor, Lat.] Subsistence together with another thing.

The secondary action subsisteth not alone, but in concomitancy with the other; so the nostrils are useful for respiration and smelling, but the principal use is smelling. Brown.

To argue from a concomitancy to a causality, is not infallibly conclusive. Glanville's Scepsis.

CONCO'MITANT, kŏn kŏm'ĕ tănt. adj. [concomitans, Lat.] Conjoined with; concurrent with; coming and going with, as collateral, not causative or consequential.

The spirit that furthereth the extension or dilatation of bodies, and is ever concomitant with porosity and dryness. Bacon.

It has pleased our wise Creator to annex to several objects, as also to several of our thoughts, a concomitant pleasure; and that in several objects, to several degrees. Locke.

CONCO'MITANT, kŏn-kŏm'ĕ-tănt. n. s. Companion; person or thing collaterally connected.

These effects are, from the local motion of the air, a concomitant of the sound, and not from the sound. Bacon.

He made him the chief concomitant of his heir apparent and only son, in a journey of much adventure. Wotton.

In consumptions, the preternatural concomitants, an universal heat of the body, a torminous diarrhœa, and hot distillations, have all a corrosive quality. Harvey on Consumptions.

The other concomitant of ingratitude is hard-heartedness, or want of compassion. South's Serm.

Horror stalks around,
Wild staring, and his sad concomitant,
Despair, of abject look. Philips.

Reproach is a concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph. Addison.

And for tobacco, who could bear it?
Filthy concomitant of claret! Prior.

Where antecedents, concomitants and consequents, causes and effects, signs and things signified, subjects and adjuncts, are necessarily connected with each other we may infer. Watts.

CONCO'MITANTLY, kŏn-kŏm'ĕ-tănt-lĕ. adv. [from concomitant.] In company with others. Dict.

To CONCO'MITATE, kŏn-kŏm'ĕ-tāte. v. a. [concomitatus, Lat.] To be collaterally connected with any thing; to come and go with another.

This simple bloody spectation of the lungs, is differenced from that which concomitates a pleurisy.

Harvey on Consumptions.

CO'NCORD, kŏng'kŏrd.[408] n. s. [concordia, Lat.]

1. Agreement between persons or things; suitableness of one to another; peace; union; mutual kindness.

Had I power, I should
Pour the sweet milk of concord into hell,
Uproar the universal peace. Shaksp. Macbeth.

What concord hath Christ with Belial.
2 Cor. vi. 15.

One shall rise
Of proud ambitious heart, who not content
With fair equality, fraternal state,
Will arrogate dominion undeserv'd
Over his brethren, and quite dispossess
Concord and law of nature from the earth. Milt.

Unsafe within the wind
Of such commotion; such as, to set forth
Great things by small, if, nature's concord broke,
Among the constellations war were sprung. Milton.

Kind concord, heavenly born! whose blissful reign
Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain;
Soul of the world! Tickel.

2. A compact.

It appeareth by the concord made between Henry and Roderick the Irish king. Davies on Ireland.

3. Harmony; consent of sounds.

The man who hath not musick in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons. Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

4. Principal grammatical relation of one word to another, distinct from regimen.

Have those who have writ about declensions, concords, and syntaxes, lost their labour? Locke.

CONCO'RDANCE, kŏn-kŏr'dânse.[408] n. s. [concordantia, Lat.]

1. Agreement.

2. A book which shews in how many texts of scripture any word occurs.

I shall take it for an opportunity to tell you, how you are to rule the city out of a concordance.

South's Sermons, Dedicat.

Some of you turn over a concordance, and there, having the principal word, introduce as much of the verse as will serve your turn. Swift.

An old concordance bound long since. Swift.

3. A concord in grammar; one of the three chief relations in speech. It is not now in use in this sense.

After the three concordances learned, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero.

Ascham's Schoolmaster.

CONCO'RDANT, kŏn-kŏr'dânt. adj. [concordans, Lat.] Agreeable; agreeing; correspondent; harmonious.

Were every one employed in points concordant to their natures, professions, and arts, commonwealths would rise up of themselves.

Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CONCO'RDATE, kŏn-kŏr'dâte.[91] n. s. [concordat, Fr. concordatum, Lat.] A compact; a convention.

How comes he to number the want of synods in the Gallican church among the grievances of that concordate, and as a mark of their slavery, since he reckons all convocations of the clergy in England to be useless and dangerous? Swift.

CONCO'RPORAL, kŏn-kŏr'pŏ-răl. adj. [from concorporo, Lat. to incorporate.] Of the same body. Dict.

To CONCO'RPORATE, kŏn-kŏr'pŏ-râte.[91] v. a. [from con and corpus.] To unite in one mass or substance.

When we concorporate the sign with the signification, we conjoin the word with the spirit.

Taylor's Worthy Communicant.

To CONCO'RPORATE, kŏn-kŏr'pŏ-râte.[91] v. n. [con and corpus.] To unite into one body.

Thus we chastise the god of wine
With water that is feminine,
Until the cooler nymph abate
His wrath, and so concorporate. Cleaveland.

CONCORPORA'TION, kŏn-kŏr-pŏ-rā'shŭn. n. s. [from concorporate.] Union in one mass; intimate mixture. Dict.

CO'NCOURSE, kŏng'kŏrse.[408] n. s. [concursus, Lat.]

1. The confluence of many persons or things to one place,

Do all the nightly guards,
The city's watches, with the people's fears,
The concourse of all good men, strike thee nothing?

Ben Jonson.

The coalition of the good frame of the universe was not the product of chance, or fortuitous concourse of particles of matter. Hale's Orig. of Mank.

Vain is his force, and vainer is his skill,
With such a concourse comes the flood of ill.

Dryden's Fables.

2. The persons assembled.

The prince with wonder hears, from ev'ry part,
The noise and busy concourse of the mart.

Dryden's Virgil.

3. The point of junction or intersection of two bodies.

So soon as the upper glass is laid upon the lower, so as to touch it at one end, and to touch the drop at the other end, making with the lower glass an angle of about ten or fifteen minutes; the drop will begin to move towards the concourse of the glasses, and will continue to move with an accelerated motion, till it arrives at that concourse of the glasses. Newton.

CONCREMA'TION, kŏng-krė-mā'shŭn. n. s. [from concremo, Lat. to burn together.] The act of burning many things together. Dict.

CO'NCREMENT, kŏng'krė-mėnt.[408] n. s. [from concresco, Lat.] The mass formed by concretion; a collection of matter growing together.

There is the cohesion of the matter into a more loose consistency, like clay, and thereby it is prepared to the concrement of a pebble or flint. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

CONCRE'SCENCE, kŏn-krės'sėnse. n. s. [from concresco, Lat.] The act or quality of growing by the union of separate particles.

Seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor inchoate, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, hath not been taught. Raleigh.

To CONCRE'TE, kŏn-krėte. v. n. [concresco, Lat.] To coalesce into one mass; to grow by the union and cohesion of parts.

The mineral or metallick matter, thus concreting with the crystalline, is equally diffused throughout the body of it. Woodward.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to a cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they concreted, floated in the liquor at equal distances, in rank and file. Newton.

The blood of some who died of the plague could not be made to concrete, by reason of the putrefaction begun. Arbuthnot.

To CONCRE'TE, kŏn-krėte. v. a. To form by concretion; to form by the coalition of scattered particles.

That there are in our inferiour world divers bodies, that are concreted out of others, is beyond all dispute: we see it in the meteors. Hale.

CO'NCRETE, kŏn-krėte'.[408] adj. [from the verb.]

1. Formed by concretion; formed by coalition of separate particles into one mass.

The first concrete state, or consistent surface, of the chaos, must be of the same figure as the last liquid state. Burnet.

2. [In logick.] Not abstract: applied to a subject.

A kind of mutual commutation there is, whereby those concrete names, God and man, when we speak of Christ, do take interchangeably one another's room; so that, for truth of speech, it skilleth not whether we say that the son of God hath created the world, and the son of man by his death hath saved it; or else that the son of man did create, and the son of God died to save, the world. Hooker.

Concrete terms, while they express the quality, do also either express, or imply, or refer to some subject to which it belongs; as white, round, long, broad, wise, mortal, living, dead: but these are not always noun adjectives in a grammatical sense; for a knave, a fool, a philosopher, and many other concretes, are substantives, as well as knavery, folly, and philosophy, which are the abstract terms that belong to them. Watts's Logick.

CO'NCRETE, kŏng'krėte.[408] n. s. A mass formed by concretion; or, union of various parts adhering to each other.

If gold itself be admitted, as it must be, for a porous concrete, the proportion of void to body, in the texture of common air, will be so much the greater. Bentley's Sermons.

CONCRE'TELY, kŏn-krėte'lė. adv. [from concrete.] In a manner including the subject with the predicate; not abstractly.

Sin, considered not abstractedly for the mere act of obliquity; but concretely, with such a special dependence of it upon the will as serves to render the agent guilty. Norris.

CONCRE'TENESS, kŏn-krėte'nės. n. s. [from concrete.] Coagulation; collection of fluids into a solid mass. Dict.

CONCRE'TION, kŏn-krė'shŭn. n. s. [from concrete.]

1. The act of concreting; coalition.
2. The mass formed by a coalition of separate particles.

Some plants, upon the top of the sea, are supposed to grow of some concretion of slime from the water, where the sea stirreth little. Bacon's Natural History.

Heat, in general, doth not resolve and attenuate the juices of a human body, for too great heat will produce concretions. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CO'NCRETIVE, kŏn-krė'tĭv. adj. [from concrete.] Having the power to produce concretions; coagulative.

When wood and other bodies petrify, we do not ascribe their induration to cold, but unto salinous spirit, or concretive juices. Brown's Vulg. Err.

CONCRE'TURE, kŏn-krė'tshŭre.[461] n. s. [from concrete.] A mass formed by coagulation.

CONCU'BINAGE, kŏn-kū'bė-nāje.[91] n. s. [concubinage, Fr. concubinatus, Lat.] The act of living with a woman not married.

Adultery was punished with death by the ancient heathens: concubinage was permitted. Broome.

CO'NCUBINE, kŏng'kū-bine.[408] n. s. [concubina, Lat.] A woman kept in fornication; a whore; a strumpet.

I know I am too mean to be your queen,
And yet too good to be your concubine.
Shaksp. Henry VI.

When his great friend was suitor to him to pardon an offender, he denied him: afterwards, when a concubine of his made the same suit, he granted it to her; and said, Such suits were to be granted to whores. Bacon.

He caused him to paint one of his concubines, Campaspe, who had the greatest share in his affection. Dryden.

The wife, though a bright goddess, thus gives place
To mortal concubines of fresh embrace. Granville.

To CONCU'LCATE, kŏn-kŭl'kāte. v. a. [conculco, Lat.] To tread, or trample, under foot. Dict.

CONCULCA'TION, kŏng-kŭl-kā'shŭn.[408] n. s. [conculcatio, Lat.] Trampling with the feet. Dict.

CONCU'PISCENCE, kŏn-kū'pė-sėnse. n. s. [concupiscentia, Lat.] Irregular desire; libidinous wish; lust; letchery.

We know even secret concupiscence to be sin; and are made fearful to offend, though it be but in a wandering cogitation. Hooker.

In our faces evident the signs
Of foul concupiscence; whence evil store,
Ev'n shame, the last of evils. Milton's Par. Lost.

Nor can they say, that the difference of climate inclines one nation to concupiscence and sensual pleasures, another to blood-thirstiness: it would discover great ignorance not to know, that a people has been overrun with recently invented vice. Bentley's Sermons.

CONCU'PISCENT, kŏn-kū'pė-sėnt. adj. [concupiscens, Lat.] Libidinous; lecherous.

He would not, but by gift of my chaste body
To his concupiscent intemperate lust,
Release my brother! Shaksp. Measure for Meas.

CONCUPISCE'NTIAL, kŏn-kū-pė-sėn'shāl. adj. [from concupiscent.] Relating to concupiscence. Dict.

CONCUPI'SCIBLE, kŏn-kū'pė-sė-bl. adj. [concupiscibilis, Lat.] Impressing desire; eager; desirous; inclining to the pursuit or attainment of any thing.

The schools reduce all the passions to these two heads, the concupiscible and irascible appetite. South's Sermons.

To CONCU'R, kŏn-kûr'.[408] v. n. [concurro, Lat.]

1. To meet in one point.

Though reason favour them, yet sense can hardly allow them; and, to satisfy, both these must concur. Temple.

2. To agree; to join in one action, or opinion.

Acts which shall be done by the greater part of my executors, shall be as valid and effectual as if all my executors had concurred in the same. Swift's Last Will.

3. It has with before the person with whom one agrees.

It is not evil simply to concur with the heathens, either in opinion or action; and that conformity with them is only then a disgrace, when we follow them in that they do amiss, or generally in that they do without reason. Hooker.

4. It has to before the effect to which one contributes.

Their affections were known to concur to the most desperate counsels. Clarendon.

Extremes in nature equal good produce,
Extremes in man concur to general use. Pope.

5. To be united with; to be conjoined.

To have an orthodox belief, and a true profession, concurring with a bad life, is only to deny Christ with a greater solemnity. South.

Testimony is the argument; and, if fair probabilities of reason concur with it, this argument hath all the strength it can have. Tillotson.

6. To contribute to one common event with joint power.

When outward causes concur, the idle are soonest seized by this infection. Collier on the Spleen.

CONCU'RRENCE, kŏn-kûr'rėnse. } n. s.
CONCU'RRENCY, kŏn-kûr'rėn-sė. }
[from concur.]

1. Union; association; conjunction.

We have no other measure but our own ideas, with the concurrence of other probable reasons, to persuade us. Locke.

2. Agreement; act of joining in any design, or measures.

Their concurrence in persuasion, about some material points belonging to the same polity, is not strange. Hooker's Preface.

The concurrence of the peers in that fury, can be imputed to the irreverence the judges were in. Clarendon.

Tarquin the proud was expelled by an universal concurrence of nobles and people. Swift on the Dissent. in Athens and Rome.

3. Combination of many agents or circumstances.

Struck with these great concurrences of things. Crashaw.

He views our behaviour in every concurrence of affairs, and sees us engage in all the possibilities of action. Addison's Spectator.

4. Assistance; help.

From these sublime images we collect the greatness of the work, and the necessity of the divine concurrence to it. Rogers.

5. Joint right; equal claim.

A bishop might have officers, if there was a concurrency of jurisdiction between him and the archdeacon. Ayliffe.

CONCU'RRENT, kŏn-kûr'rĕnt. adj. [from concur.]

1. Acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event; concomitant in agency.

I join with these laws the personal presence of the king's son, as a concurrent cause of this reformation. Davies on Ireland.

For, without the concurrent consent of all these three parts of the legislature, no such law is or can be made. Hale.

This sole vital faculty is not sufficient to exterminate noxious humours to the periphery, unless the animal faculty be concurrent with it, to supply the fibres with animal spirits. Harvey.

All combin'd,
Your beauty, and my impotence of mind;
And his concurrent flame, that blew my fire;
For still our kindred souls had one desire.
Dryden's Fables.

2. Conjoined; associate; concomitant.

There is no difference between the concurrent echo and the iterant, but the quickness or slowness of the return. Bacon.

CONCU'RRENT, kŏn-kûr'rĕnt. n. s. [from concur.] That which concurs; a contributory cause.

To all affairs of importance there are three necessary concurrents, without which they can never be dispatched; time, industry, and faculties. Decay of Piety.

CONCU'SSION, kŏn-kŭsh'ŭn. n. s. [concussio, Lat.]

1. The act of shaking; agitation; tremefaction.

It is believed that great ringing of bells, in populous cities, hath dissipated pestilent air; which may be from the concussion of the air. Bacon.

The strong concussion on the heaving tide
Roll'd back the vessel to the island's side.
Pope's Odyssey.

2. The state of being shaken.

There want not instances of such an universal concussion of the whole globe, as must needs imply an agitation of the whole abyss. Woodward.

CONCU'SSIVE, kŏn-kŭs'sĭv. adj. [concussus, Lat.] Having the power or quality of shaking.

To CONDE'MN, kŏn-dĕm'. v. a. [condemno, Lat.]

1. To find guilty; to doom to punishment: contrary to absolve.

My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And ev'ry tongue brings in a sev'ral tale,
And ev'ry tale condemns me for a villain.
Shaksp. Richard III.

Is he found guilty?——
——Yes, truly, is he, and condemn'd upon't.
Shaksp. Henry VIII.

Considered as a judge, it condemns where it ought to absolve, and pronounces absolution where it ought to condemn. Fiddes's Sermons.

2. It has to before the punishment.

The son of man shall be betrayed unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death. Matt. xx. 18.

3. To censure; to blame; to declare criminal: contrary to approve.

Who then shall blame
His pester'd senses to recoil and start,
When all that is within him does condemn
Itself for being there? Shaksp. Macbeth.

The poet, who flourished in the scene, is condemned in the ruelle. Dryden's Æneid, Preface.

He who was so unjust as to do his brother an injury, will scarce be so just as to condemn himself for it. Locke.

They who approve my conduct in this particular, are much more numerous than those who condemn it. Spectator.

4. To fine.

And the king of Egypt put him down at Jerusalem, and condemned the land in an hundred talents of silver. 2 Chronicles.

That they are captives to her reasons made.
Dryden's Tyrannic Love.

To CONFE'R, kŏn-fĕr'. v. a.

1. To compare; to examine by comparison with other things of the same kind.

The words in the eighth verse, conferred with the same words in the twentieth, make it manifest.
Raleigh.

If we confer these observations with others of the like nature, we may find cause to rectify the general opinion. Boyle.

Pliny conferring his authors, and comparing their works together, found those that went before transcribed by those that followed. Brown.

2. To give; to bestow; with on before him who receives the gift.

Rest to the limbs, and quiet I confer
On troubled minds. Waller.

The conferring this honour upon him would increase the credit he had. Clarendon.

Coronation to a king, confers no royal authority upon him. South.

There is not the least intimation in scripture of this privilege conferred upon the Roman church.
Tillotson.

Thou conferrest the benefits, and he receives them; the first produces love, and the last ingratitude. Arbuthnot's Hist. of John Bull.

3. To contribute; to conduce: with to.

The closeness and compactness of the parts resting together, doth much confer to the strength of the union. Glanville.

CO'NFERENCE, kŏn'fĕr-ĕnse.[503] n. s. [conference, Fr.]

1. The act of conversing on serious subjects; formal discourse; oral discussion of any question.

I shall grow skilful in country matters, if I have often conference with your servant. Sidney.

Sometime they deliver it, whom privately zeal and piety moveth to be instructors of others by conference; sometime of them it is taught, whom the church hath called to the public, either reading thereof, or interpreting. Hooker.

What passion hangs these weights upon my tongue!
I cannot speak to her; yet she urg'd conference.
Shaksp.

2. An appointed meeting for discussing some point by personal debate.

3. Comparison; examination of different things by comparison of each with other.

Our diligence must search out all helps and furtherances, which scriptures, councils, laws, and the mutual conference of all men's collections and observations, may afford. Hooker.

The conference of these two places, containing so excellent a piece of learning as this, expressed by so worthy a wit as Tully's was, must needs bring on pleasure to him that maketh true account of learning. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

CONFE'RRER, kŏn-fĕr'ŭr. n. s. [from confer.]

1. He that converses.

2. He that bestows.

To CONFE'SS, kŏn-fĕs'. v. a. [confesser, Fr. confiteor, confessum, Lat.]

1. To acknowledge a crime; to own a failure.

He doth in some sort confess it.——If it be confessed, it is not redressed.
Shaksp. Merry Wives of Windsor.

Human faults with human grief confess;
'Tis thou art chang'd. Prior.

2. It has of before the thing confessed, when it is used reciprocally.

Confess thee freely of thy sin;
For to deny each article with oath,
Cannot remove nor choke the strong conception.
Shaksp. Othello.

3. To disclose the state of the conscience to the priest, in order to repentance and pardon.

If our sin be only against God, yet to confess it to his minister may be of good use.
Wake's Preparation for Death.

4. It is used with the reciprocal pronoun.

Our beautiful votary took the opportunity of confessing herself to this celebrated father.
Addison's Spectator.

5. To hear the confession of a penitent, as a priest.

6. To own; to avow; to profess; not to deny.

Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven. Matt. x. 32, 33.

7. To grant; not to dispute.

If that the king
Have any way your good deserts forgot,
Which he confesseth to be manifold,
He bids you name your griefs. Shaksp.

They may have a clear view of good, great and confessed good, without being concerned, if they can make up their happiness without it. Locke.

8. To shew; to prove; to attest.

Tall thriving trees confess'd the fruitful mold;
The redd'ning apple ripens here to gold. Pope.

9. It is used in a loose and unimportant sense, by way of introduction, or as an affirmative form of speech.

I must confess I was most pleased with a beautiful prospect, that none of them have mentioned. Addison on Italy.

To CONFE'SS, kŏn-fĕs'. v. n. To make confession; to disclose; to reveal: as, he is gone to the priest to confess.

CONFE'SSEDLY, kŏn-fĕs'sĕd-lē.[364] adv. [from confessed.] Avowedly; indisputably; undeniably.

Labour is confessedly a great part of the curse, and therefore no wonder if men fly from it. South.

Great geniuses, like great ministers, though they are confessedly the first in the commonwealth of letters, must be envied and calumniated. Pope's Essay on Homer.

CONFE'SSION, kŏn-fĕsh'ŭn. n. s. [from confess.]

1. The acknowledgment of a crime; the discovery of one's own guilt.

Your engaging me first in this adventure of the Moxa, and desiring the story of it from me, is like giving one the torture, and then asking his confession, which is hard usage. Temple.

2. The act of disburdening the conscience to a priest.

You will have little opportunity to practise such a confession, and should therefore supply the want of it by a due performance of it to God. Wake's Preparation for Death.

3. Profession; avowal.

Who, before Pontius Pilate, witnessed a good confession? 1 Tim. vi. 13.

If there be one amongst the fair'st of Greece,
That loves his mistress more than in confession,
And dare avow her beauty and her worth
In other arms than hers; to him this challenge. Shakspeare.

4. A formulary in which the articles of faith are comprised.

CONFE'SSIONAL, kŏn-fĕsh'ŭn-ăl. n. s. [Fr.] The seat or box in which the confessor sits to hear the declarations of his penitents.

In one of the churches I saw a pulpit and confessional, very finely inlaid with lapis-lazuli. Addison on Italy.

CONFE'SSIONARY, kŏn-fĕsh'ŭn-ă-rē. n. s. [confessionaire, Fr.] The confession-chair or seat, where the priest sits to hear confessions. Dict.

CONFE'SSOR, kŏn'fĕs-sŭr. n. s. [confesseur, Fr.]

1. One who makes profession of his faith in the face of danger. He who dies for religion, is a martyr; he who suffers for it, is a confessor.

The doctrine in the thirty-nine articles is so orthodoxly settled, as cannot be questioned without danger to our religion, which hath been sealed with the blood of so many martyrs and confessors. Bacon's Advice to Villiers.

Was not this an excellent confessor at least, if not a martyr, in this cause? Stillingfleet.

The patience and fortitude of a martyr or confessor lie concealed in the flourishing times of Christianity. Addison's Spectator.

It was the assurance of a resurrection that gave patience to the confessor, and courage to the martyr. Rogers.

2. He that hears confessions, and prescribes rules and measures of penitence.

See that Claudio
Be executed by nine to-morrow morning:
Bring him his confessor, let him be prepar'd;
For that's the utmost of his pilgrimage. Shaksp.

If you find any sin that lies heavy upon you, disburthen yourself of it into the bosom of your confessor, who stands between God and you to pray for you. Taylor.

One must be trusted; and he thought her fit,
As passing prudent, and a parlous wit:
To this sagacious confessor he went,
And told her. Dryden's Wife of Bath.

3. He who confesses his crimes. Dict.

CONFE'ST, kŏn-fĕst'.[360] adj. [a poetical word for confessed.] Open; known; acknowledged; not concealed; not disputed; apparent.

But wherefore should I seek,
Since the perfidious author stands confest?
This villain has traduc'd me. Rowe's Royal Conv.

CONFE'STLY, kŏn-fĕst'lē.[364] adv. [from confest.] Undisputably; evidently; without doubt or concealment.

CO'NFIDANT, kŏn-fē-dănt'. n. s. [confident, Fr.] A person trusted with private affairs, commonly with affairs of love.

Martin composed his billet-doux, and entrusted it to his confidant. Arbuthnot and Pope.

To CONFI'DE, kŏn-fide'. v. n. [confido, Lat.] To trust in; to put trust in.

He alone won't betray, in whom none will confide. Congreve.

CO'NFIDENCE, kŏn'fē-dĕnse. n. s. [confidentia, Lat.]

1. Firm belief of another's integrity or veracity; reliance.

Society is built upon trust, and trust upon confidence of one another's integrity. South.

2. Trust in his own abilities or fortune; security: opposed to dejection or timidity.

Alas, my lord,
Your wisdom is consum'd in confidence:
Do not go forth to-day. Shaksp. Julius Cæsar.

His times being rather prosperous than calm, had raised his confidence by success. Bac. Hen. VII.

He had an ambition and vanity, and a confidence in himself, which sometimes intoxicated, and transported, and exposed him. Clarendon.

3. Vitious boldness; false opinion of his own excellencies: opposed to modesty.

These fervent reprehenders of things established by public authority, are always confident and bold-spirited men; but their confidence, for the most part, riseth from too much credit given to their own wits, for which cause they are seldom free from errors. Hooker's Dedication.

4. Consciousness of innocence; honest boldness; firmness of integrity.

Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God. 1 John, iii. 21.

Be merciful unto them which have not the confidence of good works. 2 Esd. viii. 36.

Just confidence, and native righteousness,
And honour. Milt. Par. Lost.

5. That which gives or causes confidence, boldness, or security.

CO'NFIDENT, kŏn'fē-dĕnt. adj. [from confide.]

1. Assured beyond doubt.

He is so sure and confident of his particular election, as to resolve he can never fall. Hammond on Fundamentals.

I am confident, that very much may be done towards the improvement of philosophy. Boyle.

2. Positive; affirmative; dogmatical: as, a confident talker.

3. Secure of success; without fear of miscarriage.

Both valiant, as men despising death; both confident, as unwonted to be overcome. Sidney.

Douglas and the Hotspur, both together,
Are confident against the world in arms. Shaksp.

Be not confident in a plain way. Eccl. xxxii. 21.

People forget how little they know, when they grow confident upon any present state of things. South.

4. Without suspicion; trusting without limits.

He, true knight,
No lesser of her honour confident,
Than I did truly find her, stakes this ring. Shaksp.

Rome, be as just and gracious unto me,
As I am confident and kind to thee. Shakspeare.

5. Bold to a vice; elated with false opinion of his own excellencies; impudent.

CO'NFIDENT, kŏn'fē-dĕnt. n. s. [from confide.] One trusted with secrets.

If ever it comes to this, that a man can say of his confident, he would have deceived me, he has said enough. South.

You love me for no other end,
But to become my confident and friend;
As such, I keep no secret from your sight. Dryden.

CO'NFIDENTLY, kŏn'fē-dĕnt-lē. adv. [from confident.]

1. Without doubt; without fear of miscarriage.

We shall not be ever the less likely to meet with success, if we do not expect it too confidently. Atterbury.

2. With firm trust.

The maid becomes a youth; no more delay
Your vows, but look, and confidently pay. Dryden.

3. Without appearance of doubt; without suspecting any failure or deficiency; positively; dogmatically.

Many men least of all know what they themselves most confidently boast. Ben Jonson.

It is strange how the ancients took up experiments upon credit, and yet did build great matters upon them: the observation of some of the best of them, delivered confidently, is, that a vessel filled with ashes will receive the like quantity of water as if it had been empty; this is utterly untrue. Bacon.

Every fool may believe, and pronounce confidently; but wise men will conclude firmly. South.

CO'NFIDENTNESS, kŏn'fē-dĕnt-nĕs. n. s. [from confident.] Favourable opinion of one's own powers; assurance. Dict.

CONFIGURA'TION, kŏn-fĭg-ū-rā'shŭn. n. s. [configuration, Fr.]

1. The form of the various parts of any thing, as they are adapted to each other.

The different effects of fire and water, which we call heat and cold, result from the so differing configuration and agitation of their particles. Glanville.

No other account can be given of the different animal secretions, than the different configuration and action of the solid parts. Arbuthnot.

There is no plastick virtue concerned in shaping them, but the configurations of the particles whereof they consist. Woodward.

2. The face of the horoscope, according to the aspects of the planets towards each other at any time.

To CONFI'GURE, kŏn-fĭg'ūre. v. a. [from figura, Lat.] To dispose into any form, by adaptation.

Mother earth brought forth legs, arms, and other members of the body, scattered and distinct, at their full growth; which coming together, cementing, and so configuring themselves into human shape, made lusty men. Bentley's Sermons.

CO'NFINE, kŏn'fine.[116] [192] n. s. [confinis, Lat. It had formerly the accent on the last syllable.] Common boundary; border; edge.

Here in these confines slily have I lurk'd,
To watch the waining of mine enemies. Shaksp.

You are old:
Nature in you stands on the very verge
Of her confine. Shaksp. King Lear.

The confines of the river Niger, where the negroes are, are well watered. Bacon.

'Twas ebbing darkness, past the noon of night,
And Phosphor on the confines of the light. Dryden.

The idea of duration, equal to a revolution of the sun, is applicable to duration, where no motion was; as the idea of a foot, taken from bodies here, to distances beyond the confines of the world, where are no bodies. Locke.

Co'NFINE, kŏn'fine. adj. [confinis, Lat.] Bordering upon; beginning where the other ends; having one common boundary.

To CONFI'NE, kŏn-fine'. v. n. To border upon; to touch on different territories, or regions: it has with or on.

Half lost, I seek
What readiest path leads where your gloomy bounds
Confine with heav'n. Milton's Par. Lost.

Full in the midst of this created space,
Betwixt heav'n, earth and skies, there stands a place
Confining on all three. Dryden.

To CONFI'NE, kŏn-fine'. v. a. [confiner, Fr. confinis, Lat.]

1. To bound; to limit: as, he confines his subject by a rigorous definition.
2. To shut up; to imprison; to immure; to restrain within certain limits.

I'll not over the threshold.——
——Fy, you confine yourself most unreasonably: come, you must go visit the good lady. Shakspeare.

I had been
As broad and gen'ral as the casing air;
But now I'm cabbin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in. Shakspeare.

3. To restrain; to tie up to.

Children, permitted the freedom of both hands, do oft times confine unto the left, and are not without great difficulty restrained from it. Brown.

Make one man's fancies, or failings, confining laws to others, and convey them as such to their succeeders. Boyle.

Where honour or where conscience does not bind,
No other tie shall shackle me;
Slave to myself I will not be;
Nor shall my future actions be confin'd
By my own present mind. Cowley.

If the gout continue, I confine myself wholly to the milk diet. Temple.

He is to confine himself to the compass of numbers, and the slavery of rhime. Dryden.

CONFI'NELESS, kŏn-fine'lĕs. adj. [from confine.] Boundless; unlimited; unbounded; without end.

Esteem him as a lamb, being compar'd
With my confineless harms. Shaksp. Macbeth.

CONFI'NEMENT, kŏn-fine'mĕnt. n. s. [from confine.] Imprisonment; incarceration; restraint of liberty.

Our hidden foes
Now joyful from their long confinement rose. Dryd.

The mind hates restraint, and is apt to fancy itself under confinement when the sight is pent up. Addison.

As to the numbers who are under restraint, people do not seem so much surprised at the confinement of some, as the liberty of others. Addison.

CONFI'NER, kŏn-fi'nûr. n. s. [from confine.]

1. A borderer; one that lives upon confines; one that inhabits the extreme parts of a country.

The senate hath stirr'd up the confiners. Shaksp.

Happy confiners you of other lands,
That shift your soil. Daniel's Civil War.

2. A near neighbour.

Though gladness and grief be opposite in nature, yet they are such neighbours and confiners in art, that the least touch of a pencil will translate a crying into a laughing face. Wotton.

3. One which touches upon two different regions.

The participles or confiners between plants and living creatures are such as have no local motion: such as oysters. Bacon.

To CONFI'RM, kŏn-fĕrm'.[108] v. a. [confirmo, Lat.]

1. To put past doubt by new evidence.

The testimony of Christ was confirmed in you. 1 Cor. i. 6.

So was his will
Pronounc'd among the gods, and by an oath,
Which shook heav'n's whole circumference, confirm'd. Milton.

Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole. Addison.

2. To settle; to establish either persons or things.

I confirm thee in the high priesthood, and appoint thee ruler. 1 Mac. xi. 57.

Confirm the crown to me and to mine heirs. Shak.

3. To fix; to radicate.

Fernelius never cured a confirmed pox without it. Wiseman.

4. To complete; to perfect.

He only liv'd but till he was a man;
The which no sooner had his prowess confirm'd,
But like a man he died. Shakspeare.

5. To strengthen by new solemnities or ties.

That treaty, so prejudicial, ought to have been remitted rather than confirmed. Swift.

6. To settle or strengthen in resolution, or purpose, or opinion.

Confirm'd then I resolve,
Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe. Milton.

They in their state though firm, stood more confirm'd. Milton.

Believe and be confirm'd. Milton.

7. To admit to the full privileges of a Christian, by imposition of hands.

Those which are thus confirmed, are thereby supposed to be fit for admission to the sacrament. Hammond's Fundamentals.

CONFI'RMABLE, kŏn-fĕr'mâ-bl. adj. [from confirm.] That which is capable of incontestible evidence.

It may receive a spurious inmate, as is confirmable by many examples. Brown's Vul. Err.

CONFIRMA'TION, kŏn-fĕr-mâ'shŭn. n. s. [from confirm.]

1. The act of establishing any thing or person; settlement; establishment.

Embrace and love this man.——
——With brother's love I do it.——
——And let heav'n
Witness how dear I hold this confirmation! Shaksp.

2. Evidence by which any thing is ascertained; additional proof.

A false report hath
Honour'd with confirmation your great judgment. Shakspeare.

The sea-captains answered, that they would perform his command; and, in confirmation thereof, promised not to do any thing which beseemed not valiant men. Knolles's Hist.

3. Proof; convincing testimony.

Wanting frequent confirmation in a matter so confirmable, their affirmation carrieth but slow persuasion. Brown.

The arguments brought by Christ for the confirmation of his doctrine, were in themselves sufficient. South.

4. An ecclesiastical rite.

What is prepared for in catechising, is, in the next place, performed by confirmation; a most profitable usage of the church, transcribed from the practice of the apostles, which consists in two parts: the child's undertaking, in his own name, every part of the baptismal vow, (having first approved himself to understand it); and to that purpose, that he may more solemnly enter this obligation, bringing some godfather with him, not now (as in baptism) as his procurator to undertake for him, but as a witness to testify his entering this obligation. Hammond on Fundamentals.

CONFIRMA'TOR, kŏn-fĕr-mâ'tûr. n. s. [from confirmo, Lat.] An attester; he that puts a matter past doubt.

There wants herein the definitive confirmator, and test of things uncertain, the sense of man. Brown.

CONFI'RMATORY, kŏn-fĕrm'â-tûr-è.[512] adj. [from confirm.] Giving additional testimony; establishing with new force.

CONFI'RMEDNESS, kŏn-fĕrm'ĕd-nĕs.[365] n. s. [from confirmed.] Confirmed state; radication.

If the difficulty arise from the confirmedness of habit, every resistance weakens the habit, abates the difficulty. Decay of Piety.

CONFI'RMER, kŏn-fĕrm'ûr. n. s. [from confirm.] One that confirms; one that produces evidence or strength; an attester; an establisher.

Be these sad sighs confirmers of thy words?
Then speak again. Shaksp. King John.

The oath of a lover is no stronger than the word of a tapster: they are both the confirmers of false reckonings. Shaksp.

CONFI'SCABLE, kŏn-fĭs'kâ-bl. adj. [from confiscate.] Liable to forfeiture.

To CONFI'SCATE, kŏn-fĭs'kâte. v. a. [confiscare, confisquer, i. e. in publicum addicere; from fiscus, which originally signifieth a hamper, pannier, basket, or freil; but metonymically the emperor's treasure, because it was anciently kept in such hampers. Cowell.] To transfer private property to the prince or publick, by way of penalty for an offence.

It was judged that he should be banished, and his whole estate confiscated and seized, and his houses pulled down. Bacon.

Whatever fish the vulgar fry excel,
Belong to Cæsar, wheresoe'er they swim,
By their own worth confiscated to him. Dryden.

CONFI'SCATE, kŏn-fĭs'kâte. adj. [from the verb.] Transferred to the public as forfeit. The accent in Shakspeare is on the first syllable.

Thy lands and goods

Are, by the laws of Venice, confiscate
Unto the state of Venice. Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

CONFISCA'TION, kŏn-fĭs-kā'shŭn. n. s. [from confiscate.] The act of transferring the forfeited goods of criminals to public use.

To the conflicting elements expos'd,
Answer meer nature. Shak. Timon.

You shall hear under the earth a horrible thundering of fire and water conflicting together. Bacon.

A man would be content to strive with himself, and conflict with great difficulties, in hopes of a mighty reward. Tillotson.

Lash'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn. Thomson.

CO'NFLICT, kŏn'flĭkt.[492] n. s. [conflictus, Lat.]

1. A violent collision, or opposition, of two substances.

Pour dephlegmed spirit of vinegar upon salt of tartar, and there will be such a conflict or ebullition, as if there were scarce two more contrary bodies in nature. Boyle.

2. A combat; a fight between two. It is seldom used of a general battle.

The luckless conflict with the giant stout,
Wherein captiv'd, of life or death he stood in doubt. Spenser.

It is my father's face,
Whom in this conflict I unawares have kill'd. Shakspeare.

3. Contest; strife; contention.

There is a kind of merry war betwixt signior Benedick and her: they never meet but there's a skirmish of wit between them.—Alas! he gets nothing by that. In our last conflict, four of his five wits went halting off. Shaksp.

4. Struggle; agony; pang.

No assurance touching victories can make present conflicts so sweet and easy, but nature will shrink from them. Hooker.

If he attempt this great change, with what labour and conflict must he accomplish it! Rogers.

He perceiv'd
Th' unequal conflict then, as angels look
On dying saints. Thomson's Summer.

CO'NFLUENCE, kŏn'flŭ-ĕnse. n. s. [confluo, Lat.]

1. The junction or union of several streams.

Nimrod, who usurped dominion over the rest, sat down in the very confluence of all those rivers which watered Paradise. Raleigh's Hist.

I have treated of the sex conformably to this definition. Addison.

CONFORMA'TION, kŏn-fôr-mā'shŭn. n. s. [Fr. conformatio, Lat.]

1. The form of things, as relating to each other, the particular texture and consistence of the parts of a body, and their disposition to make a whole: as, light of different colours is reflected from bodies;

according to their different conformation.

Varieties are found in the different natural shapes of the mouth, and several conformations of the organs. Holder.

Where there happens to be such a structure and conformation of the earth, as that the fire may pass freely into these spiracles, it then readily gets out. Woodward's Natural History.

2. The act of producing suitableness, or conformity, to any thing: with to.

Virtue and vice, sin and holiness, and the conformation of our hearts and lives to the duties of true religion and morality, are things of more consequence than the furniture of understanding. Watts.

CONFO'RMIST, kŏn-fôr'mist. n. s. [from conform.] One that complies with the worship of the church of England; not a dissenter.

They were not both nonconformists, neither both conformists. Dunton.

CONFO'RMITY, kŏn-fôr'mĕ-tè. n. s. [from conform.]

1. Similitude; resemblance; the state of having the same character of manners or form.

By the knowledge of truth, and exercise of virtue, man, amongst the creatures of this world, aspireth to the greatest conformity with God. Hooker.

Judge not what is best
By pleasure, though to nature seeming meet;
Created as thou art to nobler end,
Holy and pure, conformity divine! Milton.

Space and duration have a great conformity in this, that they are justly reckoned amongst our simple ideas. Locke.

This metaphor would not have been so general, had there not been a conformity between the mental taste and the sensitive taste. Addison.

2. It has in some authors with before the model to which the conformity is made.

The end of all religion is but to draw us to a conformity with God. Decay of Piety.

3. In some to.

We cannot be otherwise happy but by our conformity to God. Tillotson.

Conformity in building to other civil nations, hath disposed us to let our old wooden dark houses fall to decay. Graunt.

4. Consistency.

Many instances prove the conformity of the essay with the notions of Hippocrates. Arbuthnot.

CONFORTA'TION, kŏn-fôr-tà'shŭn. n. s. [from conforto, a low Latin word.] Collation of strength; corroboration.

For corroboration and confortation, take such bodies as are of astringent quality, without manifest cold. Bacon.

To CONFO'UND, kŏn-fôûnd'. v. a. [confondre, Fr. confundo, Lat.]

1. To mingle things so that their several forms or natures cannot be discerned.

Let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. Gen. xi. 7.

Two planets rushing from aspect malign,
Of fiercest opposition, in mid sky
Should combat, and their jarring spheres confound. Milton.

2. To perplex; to compare or mention without due distinction.

A fluid body and a wetting liquor are wont, because they agree in many things, to be confounded. Boyle.

They who strip not ideas from the marks men use for them, but confound them with words, must have endless dispute. Locke.

3. To disturb the apprehension by indistinct words or notions.

I am yet to think, that men find their simple ideas agree, though, in discourse, they confound one another with different names. Locke.

4. To throw into consternation; to perplex; to terrify; to amaze; to astonish; to stupify.

So spake the Son of God; and Satan stood
A while as mute, confounded what to say. Milton.

Now with furies surrounded,
Despairing, confounded,
He trembles, he glows,
Amidst Rhodope's snows. Pope's St. Cecilia.

5. To destroy; to overthrow.

The sweetest honey
Is loathsome in its own deliciousness,
And in the taste confounds the appetite. Shaksp.

A most confounded reason for his brutish conception. Grew.

Sir, I have heard another story:
He was a most confounded Tory;
And grew, or he is much belied,
Extremely dull before he died. Swift.

CONFO'UNDEDLY, kŏn-fôûn'dĕd-lè. adv. [from confounded.] Hatefully; shamefully: a low or ludicrous word.

You are confoundedly given to squirting up and down, and chattering. L'Estrange.

Thy speculations begin to smell confoundedly of woods and meadows. Addison's Spectator.

CONFO'UNDER, kŏn-fôûn'dûr. n. s. [from confound.] He who disturbs, perplexes, terrifies, or destroys.

CONFRATE'RNITY, kŏn-frâ-tĕr'nĕ-tè. n. s. [from con and fraternitas, Lat.] A brotherhood; a body of men united for some religious purpose.

We find days appointed to be kept, and a confraternity established for that purpose, with the laws of it. Stillingfleet.

CONFRICA'TION, kŏn-frè-kà'shŭn. n. s. [from con and frico, Lat.] The act of rubbing against any thing.

It hath been reported, that ivy hath grown out of a stag's horn; which they suppose did rather come from a confrication of the horn upon the ivy, than from the horn itself. Bacon.

To CONFRO'NT, kŏn-frŏnt'. v. a. [confronter, Fr.]

1. To stand against another in full view; to face.

He spoke, and then confronts the bull;
And on his ample forehead, aiming full,
The deadly stroke descended. Dryden's Virgil.

2. To stand face to face, in opposition to another.

The East and West churches did both confront the Jews, and concur with them. Hooker.

Blood hath bought blood, and blows have answer'd blows,
Strength match'd with strength, and power confronted power. Shakspeare's King John.

Bellona's bridegroom, lapt in proof,
Confronted him with self comparisons,
Point against point rebellious, arm 'gainst arm. Shakspeare's Macbeth.

3. To oppose one evidence to another in open court

We began to lay his unkindness unto him: he seeing himself confronted by so many went not to denial, but to justify his cruel falsehood. Sidney.

4. To compare one thing with another.

When I confront a medal with a verse, I only shew you the same design executed by different hands. Addison on Medals.

CONFRONTA'TION, kŏn-frŏn-tà'shŭn. n. s. [Fr.] The act of bringing two evidences face to face.

To CONFU'SE, kŏn-fûze'. v. a. [confusus, Lat.]

1. To disorder; to disperse irregularly.

Thus roving on
In confus'd march forlorn, the advent'rous bands
View'd first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest. Milton.

2. To mix, not separate.

At length an universal hubbub wild,
Of stunning sounds and voices all confus'd,
Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear. Milton.

3. To perplex, not distinguish; to obscure.

We may have a clear and distinct idea of the existence of many things, though our ideas of their intimate essences and causes are very confus'd and obscure. Watts's Logick.

4. To hurry the mind.

Confus'd and sadly she at length replies. Pope.

CONFU'SEDLY, kŏn-fû'zĕd-lè.[364] adv. [from confused.]

1. In a mixed mass; without separation.

These four nations are every where mixed in the Scriptures, because they dwelt confusedly together. Raleigh's History.

2. Indistinctly; one mingled with another.

The inner court with horror, noise, and tears
Confus'dly fill'd; the women's shrieks and cries
The arched vaults re-echo. Denham.

On mount Vesuvius next he fix'd his eyes,
And saw the smoaking tops confus'dly rise;
A hideous ruin! Addison on Italy.

I viewed through a prism, and saw them most confusedly defined, so that I could not distinguish their smaller parts from one another. Newton.

Heroes and heroines shouts confus'dly rise,
And base and treble voices strike the skies. Pope.

He confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion. Clarendon.

4. Tumultuously; hastily; not deliberately; not exactly.

The propriety of thoughts and words, which are the hidden beauties of a play, are but confusedly judged in the vehemence of action. Dryden.

CONFU'SEDNESS, kŏn-fû'zĕd-nĕs.[365] n. s. [from confused.] Want of distinctness; want of clearness.

Hitherunto these titles of honour carry a kind of confusedness, and rather betokened a successive office than an established dignity. Carew.

The cause of the confusedness of our notions, next to natural inability, is want of attention. Norris.

CONFU'SION, kŏn-fû'zhŭn. n. s. [from confuse.]

1. Irregular mixture; tumultuous medley.

God, only wise, to punish pride of wit,
Among men's wits hath this confusion wrought;
As the proud tow'r, whose points the clouds did hit,
By tongues confusion was to ruin brought. Davies.

2. Tumult; disorder.

God is not a God of sedition and confusion, but of order and of peace. Hooker, Preface.

This is a happier and more comely time,
Than when these fellows ran about the streets
Crying confusion. Shakspeare's Coriolanus.

3. Indistinct combination.

The confusion of two different ideas, which a customary connexion of them in their minds hath made to them almost one, fills their heads with false views, and their reasonings with false consequences. Locke.

4. Overthrow; destruction.
The strength of their illusion,
Shall draw him in to his confusion. Shakspeare.
5. Astonishment; distraction of mind; hurry of ideas.
Confusion dwelt in ev'ry face,
And fear in ev'ry heart,
When waves on waves, and gulphs in gulphs,
O'ercome the pilot's art. Spectator.

CONFU'TABLE, kŏn-fū'tă-bl. adj. [from confute.] Possible to be disproved; possible to be shewn false.
At the last day, that inquisitor shall not present to God a bundle of calumnies, or confutable accusations; but will offer unto his omniscience a true list of our transgressions. Brown.

CONFUTA'TION, kŏn-fū-tā'shŭn. n. s. [confutatio, Lat.] The act of confuting; disproof.
A confutation of atheism from the frame of the world. Bentley.

To CONFU'TE, kŏn-fūte'. v. a. [confuto, Lat.] To convict of errour or falsehood; to disprove.
He could on either side dispute;
Confute, change hands, and still confute. Hudibras.
For a man to doubt whether there be any hell, and thereupon to live as if there were none, but, when he dies, to find himself confuted in the flames, must be the height of woe. South.

CO'NGE, kŏn-jēē'. n. s. [congé, Fr.]
1. Act of reverence; bow; courtesy.
The captain salutes you with congé profound,
And your ladyship curt'sies half way to the ground. Swift.
2. Leave; farewell.
So courteous congé both did give and take,
With right hands plighted, pledges of good-will. Fairy Queen.

To CO'NGE, kŏn-jēē'. v. n. [from the noun.] To take leave.
I have congeed with the duke, and done my adieu with his nearest. Shakspeare.

CO'NGE D'ELIRE, kŏn-jē-dē-lēēr'. is French; and signifies, in common law, the king's permission royal to a dean and chapter, in time of vacation, to chuse a bishop. The king, as sovereign patron of all archbishopricks, bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical benefices, had, in ancient times, the free appointment of all ecclesiastical dignities; investing them first per baculum & annulum, and afterwards by his letters patent. In process of time he made the election over to others, under certain forms and conditions; as, that they should, at every vacation, before they chuse, demand of the king a congé d'elire, that is, licence to proceed to election. Cowell.
A woman, when she has made her own choice, for form's sake, sends a congé d'elire to her friends. Spectator.

CO'NGE, kŏn'jēē. n. s. [In architecture.] A moulding in form of a quarter round, or a cavetto, which serves to separate two members from one another: such is that which joins the shaft of the column to the cincture. Chambers.

To CONGE'AL, kŏn-jēēl'. v. a. [congelo, Lat.]
1. To turn, by frost, from a fluid to a solid state.
What more miraculous thing may be told,
Than ice, which is congeal'd with senseless cold,
Should kindle fire by wonderful device? Spenser.
In whose capacious womb
A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congeal'd. Thomson.
2. To bind or fix, as by cold.
Oh, gentlemen, see! see! dead Henry's wounds
Open their congeal'd mouths, and bleed afresh. Shakspeare's Richard III.
Too much sadness hath congeal'd your blood. Shakspeare.

To CONGE'AL, kŏn-jēēl'. v. n. To concrete; to gather into a mass by cold.
In the midst of molten lead, when it beginneth to congeal, make a little dent, into which put quicksilver wrapt in linen, and it will fix and run no more, and endure the hammer. Bacon.
When water congeals, the surface of the ice is smooth and level, as the surface of the water was before. Burnet's Theory.

CONGE'ALMENT, kŏn-jēēl'mĕnt. n. s. [from congeal.] The clot formed by congelation; concretion.
Enter the city, clip your wives, your friends;
Tell them your feats, whilst they with joyful tears
Wash the congealment from your wounds. Shaksp.

CONGE'LABLE, kŏn-jēēl'ă-bl. adj. [from congeal.] Susceptible of congelation; capable of losing its fluidity.
The consistencies of bodies are very divers: dense, rare, tangible, pneumatical, fixed, hard, soft, congelable, not congelable, liquefiable, not liquefiable. Bacon.
The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fixable in the fire, and congelable again by cold into brittle glebes or crystals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONGELA'TION, kŏn-jē-lā'shŭn. n. s. [from congeal.]
1. The act of turning fluids to solids by cold.
The capillary tubes are obstructed either by outward compression or congelation of the fluid. Arbuthnot on Aliments.
There are congelations of the redundant water, precipitations, and many other operations. Arbuthnot on Air.
2. State of being congealed, or made solid by cold.
Many waters and springs will never freeze; and many parts in rivers and lakes, where there are mineral eruptions, will still persist without congelation. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CO'NGENER, kŏn-jē'nŭr.[98] n. s. [Lat.] Of the same kind or nature.
The cherry-tree has been often grafted on the laurel, to which it is a congener. Miller.

CONGE'NEROUS, kŏn-jĕn'ĕr-rŭs. adj. [congener, Lat.] Of the same kind; arising from the same original.
Those bodies, being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their nature. Brown's Vulgar Errours.
From extreme and lasting colds proceeds a great run of apoplexies, and other congenerous diseases. Arbuthnot on Air.

CONGE'NEROUSNESS, kŏn-jĕn'ĕr-rŭs-nĕs. n. s. [from congenerous.] The quality of being from the same original; belonging to the same class. Dict

CONGE'NIAL, kŏn-jē'nē-ăl. adj. [con and genus, Lat.] Partaking of the same genius; kindred; cognate: in Swift it is followed by with.
He sprung, without any help, by a kind of congenial composure, as we may term it, to the likeness of our late sovereign and master. Wotton.
You look with pleasure on those things which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions. Dryden's Dedicat. of Juv.
Smit with the love of sister arts we came,
And met congenial, mingling flame with flame. Pope.
He acquires a courage, and stiffness of opinion, not at all congenial with him. Swift.

CONGENIA'LITY, kŏn-jē-nē-ăl'ē-tē. n. s. [from congenial.] Participation of the same genius; cognation of mind; or nature.

CONGE'NITE, kŏn-jĕn'nīt.[140 154] adj. [congenitus, Lat.] Of the same birth; born with another; connate; begotten together.
Many conclusions of moral and intellectual truths seem, upon this account, to be congenite with us, connatural to us, and engraven in the very frame of the soul. Hale's Origin of Mankind.
Did we learn an alphabet in our embryo-state? And how comes it to pass, that we are not aware of any such congenite apprehensions. Glanville.

CO'NGER, kŏng'jŭr.[409] n. s. [congrus, Lat.] The sea-eel.
Many fish, whose shape and nature are much like the eel, frequent both the sea and fresh rivers; as the mighty conger, taken often in the Severn. Walton's Angler.

CONGE'RIES, kŏn-jē'rē-ēs. n. s. [Lat.] A mass of small bodies heaped up together.
The air is nothing but a congeries or heap of small, and for the most part of flexible, particles, of several sizes, and of all kinds of figures. Boyle.

To CONGE'ST, kŏn-jĕst'. v. a. [congero, congestum, Lat.] To heap up; to gather together.

CONGE'STIBLE, kŏn-jĕst'ē-bl. adj. [from congest.] That may be heaped up. Dict.

CONGE'STION, kŏn-jĕst'yŭn.[464] n. s. [congestio, Lat.] A collection of matter; as in abscesses and tumours. Quincy.
Congestion is then said to be the cause of a tumour, when the growth of it is slow, and without pain. Wiseman.

CO'NGIARY, kŏn'jē-ă-rē. n. s. [congiarium, from congius, a measure of corn, Lat.] A gift distributed to the Roman people or soldiery originally in corn, afterwards in money.
We see on them the emperor and general officers, standing as they distributed a congiary to the soldiers or people. Addison.

To CONGLA'CIATE, kŏn-glā'shē-āte.[481] v. n. [conglaciatus, Lat.] To turn to ice.
No other doth properly conglaciate but water: for the determination of quicksilver is properly fixation, and that of milk coagulation. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CONGLACIA'TION, kŏng-glā-shē-ā'shŭn.[409] n. s. [from conglaciate.] The state of being changed, or act of changing, into ice.
If crystal be a stone, it is concreted by a mineral spirit, and lapidifical principles; for, while it remained in a fluid body, it was a subject very unfit for proper conglaciation. Brown.

To CO'NGLOBATE, kŏn-glō'bāte. v. a. [conglobatus, Lat.] To gather into a hard firm ball.
The testicle, as is said, is one large conglobated

gland, consisting of soft fibres, all in one convolution. Grew.

CO'NGLOBATE, kŏn-glŏ'bāte.[91] adj. [from the verb.] Moulded into a firm ball; of which the fibres are not distinctly visible.

Fluids are separated from the blood in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne's Philosophical Principles.

CO'NGLOBATELY, kŏn-glŏ'bāte-lė. adv. [from conglobate.] In a spherical form. Dict.

CONGLOBA'TION, kŏng-glŏ-bā'shŭn.[408] n. s. [from conglobate.] A round body; collection into a round mass.

In this spawn are discerned many specks, or little conglobations, which in time become black. Brown.

To CONGLO'BE, kŏng-glōbe'. v. a. [conglobo, Lat.] To gather into a round mass; to consolidate in a ball.

Then he founded, then conglob'd
Like things to like. Milton.

For all their centre found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around:
Not closer, orb in orb conglob'd, are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen. Pope.

To CONGLO'BE, kŏn-glōbe'. v. n. To coalesce into a round mass.

Thither they
Hasted with glad precipitance, up-roll'd
As drops on dust conglobing from the dry. Milton.

To CONGLO'MERATE, kŏn-glŏm'ėr-āte. v. a. [conglomero, Lat.] To gather into a ball, like a ball of thread; to inweave into a round mass.

The liver is one great conglomerated gland, composed of innumerable small glands, each of which consisteth of soft fibres, in a distinct or separate convolution. Grew's Cosmologia.

CONGLO'MERATE, kŏn-glŏm'ėr-āte.[91] adj. [from the verb.]

1. Gathered into a round ball, so as that the constituent parts and fibres are distinct.

Fluids are separated in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne.

2. Collected; twisted together.

The beams of light, when they are multiplied and conglomerate, generate heat. Bacon.

CONGLOMERA'TION, kŏn-glŏm-ėr-ā'shŭn. n. s. [from conglomerate.]

1. Collection of matter into a loose ball.
2. Intertexture; mixture.

The multiplication and conglomeration of sounds doth generate rarefaction of the air. Bacon.

Bags for the conqueror's crew. Cowley.

A critick that attacks authors in reputation, is as the slave who called out to the conqueror, Remember, Sir, that you are a man. Addison.

2. One that subdues and ruins countries.

Deserving freedom more
Than those their conquerors, who leave behind
Nothing but ruin wheresoe'er they rove. Milton.

That tyrant god, that restless conqueror,
May quit his pleasure, to assert his pow'r. Prior.

CO'NQUEST, kŏng'kwĕst.[408 415] n. s. [conqueste, Fr.]

1. The act of conquering; subjection.

A perfect conquest of a country reduces all the people to the condition of subjects. Davies.

2. Acquisition by victory; thing gained.

More willingly I mention air,
This our old conquest; than remember hell,
Our hated habitation. Milton's Par. Reg.

3. Victory; success in arms.

I must yield my body to the earth,
And, by my fall, the conquest to my foe. Shaksp.

I'll lead thy daughter to a conqueror's bed;
To whom I will retail my conquest won,
And she shall be sole victress. Shaksp.

Not to be o'ercome, was to do more
Than all the conquests former kings did gain. Dryden.

In joys of conquest he resigns his breath,
And, fill'd with England's glory, smiles in death. Addison.

CO'NSCIENCE, kŏn'shênse.[357] n. s. [conscientia, Lat.]

1. The knowledge or faculty by which we judge of the goodness or wickedness of ourselves.

When a people have no touch of conscience, no sense of their evil doings, it is bootless to think to restrain them. Spenser.

Who against faith and conscience can be heard
Infallible? Milton's Par. Lost.

Conscience has not been wanting to itself in endeavouring to get the clearest information about the will of God. South.

But why must those be thought to 'scape, that feel
Those rods of scorpions, and those whips of steel
Which conscience shakes? Creech's Juvenal.

No courts created yet, nor cause was heard;
But all was safe, for conscience was their guard. Dryden.

Conscience signifies that knowledge which a man hath of his own thoughts and actions; and because, if a man judgeth fairly of his actions by comparing them with the law of God, his mind will approve or condemn him, this knowledge or conscience may be both an accuser and a judge. Swift.

2. Justice; the estimate of conscience; the determination of conscience; honesty. This is sometimes a serious, and sometimes a ludicrous sense.

This is thank-worthy, if a man, for conscience towards God, endure grief. 1 Peter, ii. 19.

Her majesty is obliged in conscience to endeavour this by her authority, as much as by her practice. Swift.

3. Consciousness; knowledge of our own thoughts or actions.

Merit, and good works, is the end of man's motion; and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man's rest. Bacon.

The reason why the simpler sort are moved with authority, is the conscience of their own ignorance. Hooker.

The sweetest cordial we receive at last,
Is conscience of our virtuous actions past. Denham.

Hector was in an absolute certainty of death, and depressed with the conscience of being in an ill cause. Pope.

4. Real sentiment; veracity; private thoughts.

Dost thou in conscience think, tell me, Æmilia,
That there be women do abuse their husbands
In such gross kind? Shaksp.

They did in their consciences know, that he was not able to send them any part of it. Clarendon.

5. Scruple; principle of action.

We must make a conscience in keeping the just laws of superiours. Taylor.

Why should not the one make as much conscience of betraying for gold, as the other of doing it for a crust? L'Estrange.

Children are travellers newly arrived in a strange country; we should therefore make conscience not to mislead them. Locke.

6. In ludicrous language, reason; reasonableness.

Why dost thou weep? Can'st thou the conscience lack,
To think I shall lack friends? Shaksp.

Half a dozen fools are, in all conscience, as many as you should require. Swift.

CONSCIE'NTIOUS, kŏn-shé-ĕn'shŭs. adj. [from conscience.] Scrupulous; exactly just; regulated by conscience.

Lead a life in so conscientious a probity, as in thought, word, and deed, to make good the character of an honest man. L'Estrange.

CONSCIE'NTIOUSLY, kŏn-shé-ĕn'shŭs-lé. adv. [from conscientious.] According to the direction of conscience.

More stress has been laid upon the strictness of law, than conscientiously did belong to it. L'Estra.

There is the erroneous as well as the rightly informed conscience; and, if the conscience happens to be deluded, sin does not therefore cease to be sin, because a man committed it conscientiously. South.

CONSCIE'NTIOUSNESS, kŏn-shé-ĕn'shŭs-nês. n. s. [from conscientious.] Exactness of justice; tenderness of conscience.

It will be a wonderful conscientiousness in them, if they will content themselves with less profit than they can make. Locke.

Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence. Bentley.

Among substances, some are thinking or conscious beings, or have a power of thought. Watts.

2. Knowing from memory; having the knowledge of any thing without any new information.

The damsel then to Tancred sent,
Who, conscious of th' occasion, fear'd the event. Dryden.

3. Admitted to the knowledge of any thing: with to.

The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine;
Æneas only, conscious to the sign,
Presag'd th' event. Dryden.

Roses or honey cannot be thought to smell or taste their own sweetness, or an organ be conscious to its musick, or gunpowder to its flashing or noise. Bentley's Sermons.

4. Bearing witness by the dictate of conscience to any thing.

The queen had been solicitous with the king on his behalf, being conscious to herself that he had been encouraged by her. Clarendon.

CO'NSCIOUSLY, kŏn'shŭs-lé. adv. [from conscious.] With knowledge of one's own actions.

If these perceptions, with their consciousness, always remained in the mind, the same thinking thing would be always consciously present. Locke.

CO'NSCIOUSNESS, kŏn'shŭs-nês. n. s. [from conscious.]

1. The perception of what passes in a man's own mind. Locke.

If spirit be without thinking, I have no idea of any thing left; therefore consciousness must be its essential attribute. Watts.

2. Internal sense of guilt, or innocence.

No man doubts of a Supreme Being, until, from the consciousness of his provocations, it become his interest there should be none. Govern. of the Tong.

Such ideas, no doubt, they would have had, had not their consciousness to themselves, of their ignorance of them, kept them from so idle an attempt. Locke.

An honest mind is not in the power of a dishonest: to break its peace, there must be some guilt or consciousness. Pope.

CO'NSCRIPT, kŏn'skript. adj. [from conscribo, Lat.] A term used in speaking of the Roman senators, who were called Patres conscripti, from their names being written in the register of the senate.

3. Sometimes with upon.

This satisfaction or dissatisfaction, consequent upon a man's acting suitably or unsuitably to conscience, is a principle not easily to be worn out. South.

Co'NSEQUENT, kŏn'sē-kwĕnt. n. s.

1. Consequence; that which follows from previous propositions by rational deduction.

Doth it follow that they, being not the people of God, are in nothing to be followed? This consequent were good, if only the custom of the people of God is to be observed. Hooker.

2. Effect; that which follows an acting cause.

They were ill paid; and they were ill governed, which is always a consequent of ill payment. Davies on Ireland.

He could see consequents yet dormant in their principles, and effects yet unborn. South.

CONSEQUE'NTIAL, kŏn-sē-kwĕn'shăl. adj. [from consequent.]

1. Produced by the necessary concatenation of effects to causes.

We sometimes wrangle, when we should debate;
A consequential ill which freedom draws;
A bad effect, but from a noble cause. Prior.

2. Having the consequences justly connected with the premises; conclusive.

Though these kind of arguments may seem obscure; yet, upon a due consideration of them, they are highly consequential and concludent to my purpose. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

CONSEQUEN'TIALLY, kŏn sē-kwĕn'shăl-ē. adv. [from consequential.]

1. With just deduction of consequences; with right connexion of ideas.

No body writes a book without meaning something, though he may not have the faculty of writing consequentially, and expressing his meaning. Addison's Whig Examiner.

2. By consequence; not immediately; eventually.

This relation is so necessary, that God himself cannot discharge a rational creature from it; although consequentially indeed he may do so, by the annihilation of such creatures. South.

3. In a regular series.

Were a man a king in his dreams, and a beggar awake, and dreamt consequentially, and in continued unbroken schemes, would he be in a reality a king or a beggar? Addison.

CONSEQUE'NTIALNESS, kŏn-sė-kwĕn'shâl-nĕs. n. s. [from consequential.] Regular consecution of discourse. Dict.

CON'SEQUENTLY, kŏn'sė-kwĕnt-lė. adv. [from consequent.]

1. By consequence; necessarily; inevitably: by the connexion of effects to their causes.

In the most perfect poem a perfect idea was required, and consequently all poets ought rather to imitate it. Dryden.

The place of the several sorts of terrestrial matter, sustained in the fluid, being contingent and uncertain, their intermixtures with each other are consequently so. Woodward.

2. In consequence; pursuantly.

There is consequently, upon this distinguishing principle, an inward satisfaction or dissatisfaction in the heart of every man, after good or evil. South.

CO'NSEQUENTNESS, kŏn'sė-kwĕnt-nĕs. n. s. [from consequent.] Regular connexion of propositions; consecution of discourse.

Let them examine the consequentness of the whole body of the doctrine I deliver. Digby on the Soul, Dedication.

Cannot be human consort. Milton.

Male he created thee, but thy consort
Female for race: then bless'd mankind, and said,
Be fruitful, multiply, and fill the earth. Milton.

Thy Bellona, who thy consort came
Not only to thy bed, but to thy fame. Denham.

He single chose to live, and shunn'd to wed,
Well pleas'd to want a consort of his bed. Dryden.

His warlike amazon her host invades,
Th' imperial consort of the crown of spades. Pope.

2. An assembly; a divan; a consultation.

In one consort there sat
Cruel revenge, and rancorous despite,
Disloyal treason, and heart-burning hate. Fairy Q.

3. A number of instruments playing together; a symphony. This is probably a mistake for concert.

A consort of musick in a banquet of wine, is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold. Ecclus. xxxii. 5.

4. Concurrence; union.

Take it singly, and it carries an air of levity; but, in consort with the rest, has a meaning quite different. Atterbury.

To Conso'rt, kŏn-sŏrt'. v. n. [from the noun.] To associate with; to unite with; to keep company with.

What will you do? Let's not consort with them. Shakspeare.

Which of the Grecian chiefs consorts with thee. Dryden.

To Conso'rt, kŏn-sŏrt'. v. a.

Conspi'cuousness, kŏn-spĭ-kŭ'-ŭs-nės. n. s. [from conspicuous.]

1. Exposure to the view; state of being visible at a distance.

Looked on with such a weak light, they appear well proportioned fabricks; yet they appear so but in that twilight, which is requisite to their conspicuousness. Boyle.

2. Eminence; fame; celebrity.

Their writings attract more readers by the author's conspicuousness. Boyle.

Conspi'racy, kŏn-spĭr'ă-sė.[109] n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.]

1. A private agreement among several persons to commit some crime; a plot; a concerted treason.

O conspiracy!
Sham'st thou to shew thy dang'rous brow by night,
When evils are most free? Shaksp.

I had forgot that foul conspiracy
Of the beast Caliban, and his confed'rates,
Against my life. Shaksp.

When scarce he had escap'd the blow
Of faction and conspiracy,
Death did his promis'd hopes destroy. Dryden.

2. In law, an agreement of men to do any thing; always taken in the evil part. It is taken for a confederacy of two, at the least, falsely to indict one, or to procure one to be indicted, of felony. Cowell.

3. A concurrence; a general tendency of many causes to one event.

When the time now came that misery was ripe for him, there was a conspiracy in all heavenly and earthly things, to frame fit occasions to lead him unto it. Sidney.

The air appearing so malicious in this morbific conspiracy, exacts a more particular regard. Harvey.

Conspi'rant, kŏn-spi'rânt. adj. [conspirans, Lat.] Conspiring; engaging in a conspiracy or plot; plotting.

Thou art a traitor,
Conspirant 'gainst this high illustrious prince. Shaksp.

Conspira'tion, kŏn-spė-rā'shŭn. n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.] An agreement of many to one end.

One would wonder how, from so differing premises, they should infer the same conclusion, were it not that the conspiration of interest were too potent for the diversity of judgment. Decay of Piety.

Conspi'rator, kŏn-spĭr'ă-tŭr. n. s. [from conspiro, Lat.] A man engaged in a plot; one who has secretly concerted with others the commission of a crime; a plotter.

Achitophel is among the conspirators with Absalom. 2 Samuel.

Stand back, thou manifest conspirator;
Thou that contriv'st to murder our dread lord. Shaksp.

But let the bold conspirator beware;
For heav'n makes princes its peculiar care. Dryden.

One put into his hand a note of the whole conspiracy against him, together with all the names of the conspirators. South.

To CONS'PIRE, kŏn-spire'. v. n. [conspiro, Lat.]

1. To concert a crime; to plot; to hatch secret treason.

That do conspire my death with devilish plots
Of damned witchcraft. Shaks. Rich. III.

What was it
That mov'd pale Cassius to conspire? Shaksp.

They took great indignation, and conspired against the king. Apocrypha.

Let the air be excluded; for that undermineth the body, and conspireth with the spirit of the body to dissolve it. Bacon.

There is in man a natural possibility to destroy the world; that is, to conspire to know no woman. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

The press, the pulpit, and the stage,
Conspire to censure and expose our age. Roscom.

2. To agree together; as, all things conspire to make him happy.

So moist and dry, when Phœbus shines,
Conspiring give the plant to grow. Heigh

CONSPI'RER, kŏn-spī'rŭr. n. s. [from conspire.] A conspirator; a plotter.

Take no care,
Who chafes, who frets, and where conspirers are:
Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be. Shaksp. Macb.

CONSPI'RING Powers, kŏn-spī'ring. [In mechanicks.] All such as act in direction not opposite to one another. Harris.

CONSPURCA'TION, kŏn-spŭr-kā'shŭn. n. s. [from conspurco, Lat.] The act of defiling; defilement; pollution.

CO'NSTABLE, kŭn'stā-bl.[165] n. s. [comes stabuli, as it is supposed.]

1. Lord high constable is an ancient officer of the crown. The function of the constable of England consisted in the care of the common peace of the land in deeds of arms and in matters of war. To the court of the constable and marshal belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blasonry of arms within it. The first constable of England was created by the Conqueror, and the office continued hereditary till the thirteenth of Henry VIII. when it was laid aside, as being so powerful as to become troublesome to the king. From these mighty magistrates are derived the inferiour constables of hundreds and franchises; two of whom were ordained, in the thirteenth of Edward I. to be chosen in every hundred, for the conservation of the peace, and view of armour. These are now called high constables; because continuance of time, and increase both of people and offences, have occasioned others in every town of inferiour authority, called petty constables. Besides these, we have constables denominated from particular places; as, constable of the Tower, of Dover Castle, of the Castle of Carnarvon: but these are properly castellani, or governours of castles. Cowell. Chambers.

When I came hither, I was lord high constable,
And duke of Buckingham; now poor Edward Bohun. Shakspeare.

The knave constable had set me i' th' stocks, i' th' common stocks, for a witch. Shaksp.

The constable being a sober man, and an enemy to sedition, went to observe what they did. Clar.

2. To over-run the Constable. [perhaps from conte stable, Fr. the settled, firm, and stated account.] To spend more than what a man knows himself to be worth: a low phrase.

CO'NSTABLESHIP, kŭn'stā-bl-shĭp. n. s. [from constable]. The office of a constable.

This keepership is annexed to the constableship of the castle, and that granted out in lease. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

CO'NSTANCY, kŏn'stăn-sē. n. s. [constantia, Lat.]

1. Immutability; perpetuity; unalterable continuance.

The laws of God himself no man will ever deny to be of a different constitution from the former, in respect of the one's constancy, and the mutability of the other. Hooker.

2. Consistency; unvaried state.

Incredible, that constancy in such a variety, such a multiplicity, should be the result of chance. Ray.

3. Resolution; firmness; steadiness; unshaken determination.

In a small isle, amidst the widest seas,
Triumphant constancy has fix'd her seat;
In vain the syrens sing, the tempests beat. Prior.

4. Lasting affection; continuance of love, or friendship.

Constancy is such a stability and firmness of friendship, as overlooks and passes by lesser failures of kindness, and yet still retains the same habitual good-will to a friend. South.

5. Certainty; veracity; reality.

But all the story of the night told over,
More witnesseth than fancy's images,
And grows to something of great constancy,
But, however, strange and admirable. Shaksp.

CO'NSTANT, kŏn'stănt. adj. [constans, Lat.]

1. Firm; fixed; not fluid.

If you take highly rectified spirit of wine, and dephlegmed spirit of urine, and mix them, you may turn these two fluid liquors into a constant body. Boyle.

2. Unvaried; unchanged; immutable; durable.

The world's a scene of changes, and to be Constant, in nature were inconstancy. Cowley.

3. Firm, resolute; determined; immoveable; unshaken.

Some shrewd contents
Now steal the colour from Bassanio's cheek:
Some dear friend dead; else nothing in the world
Could turn so much the constitution
Of any constant man. Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

4. Free from change of affection.

Both loving one fair maid, they yet remained constant friends. Sidney.

5. Certain; not various; steady; firmly adherent: with to.

Now through the land his care of souls he stretch'd,
And like a primitive apostle preach'd;
Still cheerful, ever constant to his call;
By many follow'd, lov'd by most, admir'd by all. Dryden.

He shewed his firm adherence to religion, as modelled by our national constitution; and was constant to its offices in devotion, both in publick, and in his family. Addison's Freeholder.

CO'NSTANTLY, kŏn'stănt-lē. adv. [from constant.] Unvariably; perpetually; certainly; steadily.

It is strange that the fathers should never appeal; nay, that they should not constantly do it. Tillotson.

To CONSTE'LLATE, kŏn-stĕl'lāte. v. n. [constellatus, Lat.] To join lustre; to shine with one general light.

The several things which engage our affections do, in a transcendent manner, shine forth and constellate in God. Boyle.

To CONSTE'LLATE, kŏn-stĕl'lāte. v. a. To unite several shining bodies in one splendour.

Great constitutions, and such as are constellated into knowledge, do nothing till they outdo all. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

These scattered perfections, which were divided among the several ranks of inferiour natures, were summed up and constellated in ours. Glanville.

CONSTELLA'TION, kŏn-stĕl-lā'shŭn. n. s. [from constellate.]

1. A cluster of fixed stars.

For the stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light. Isaiah, xiii. 10.

The earth, the air, resounded;
The heav'ns and all the constellations rung. Milton.

A constellation is but one,
Though 'tis a train of stars. Dryden.

2. An assemblage of splendours, or excellencies.

The condition is a constellation or conjuncture of all those gospel graces, faith, hope, charity, self-denial, repentance, and the rest. Hammond.

CONSTERNA'TION, kŏn-stĕr-nā'shŭn. n. s. [from consterno, Lat.] Astonishment; amazement; alienation of mind by a surprize; surprize; wonder.

They find the same holy consternation upon themselves that Jacob did at Bethel, which he called the gate of heaven. South.

The natives, dubious whom
They must obey, in consternation wait
Till rigid conquest will pronounce their liege. Philips.

To CO'NSTIPATE, kŏn'stĕ-pāte. v. a. [from constipo, Lat.]

1. To crowd together in a narrow room; to thicken; to condense.

Of cold, the property is to condense and constipate. Bacon.

It may, by amassing, cooling, and constipating of waters, turn them into rain. Ray on the Creat.

There might arise some vertiginous motions or whirlpools in the matter of the chaos, whereby the atoms might be thrust and crowded to the middle of those whirlpools, and there constipate one another into great solid globes. Bentley.

2. To stuff up, or stop by filling up the passages.

It is not probable that any aliment should have the quality of intirely constipating or shutting up the capillary vessels. Arbuthnot on Alim.

3. To bind the belly, or make costive.

Omitting honey, which is laxative, and the powder of some loadstones in this, doth rather constipate and bind, than purge and loosen the belly. Brown.

CONSTIPA'TION, kŏn-stĕ-pā'shŭn. n. s. [from constipate.]

1. The act of crowding any thing into less room; condensation.

This worketh by the detention of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts. Bacon.

It requires either absolute fulness of matter, or a pretty close constipation and mutual contact of its particles. Bentley.

2. Stoppage; obstruction by plenitude.

The inactivity of the gall occasions a constipation of the belly. Arbuth. on Alim.

3. The state of having the body bound.

CONSTI'TUENT, kŏn-stĭtsh'ū-ĕnt.[461] adj. [constituens, Lat.] That which makes any thing what it is; necessary to existence; elemental; essential; that of which any thing consists.

Body, soul, and reason, are the three parts necessarily constituent of a man. Dryden.

All animals derived all the constituent matter of their bodies, successively, in all ages, out of this fund. Woodward.

It is impossible that the figures and sizes of its constituent particles, should be so justly adapted as to touch one another in every point. Bentley.

CONSTI'TUENT, kŏn-stĭtsh'ū-ĕnt.[461] n. s.

1. The person or thing which constitutes or settles any thing in its peculiar state.

Their first composure and origination requires a higher and nobler constituent than chance. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

2. That which is necessary to the subsistence of any thing.

The obstruction of the mesentery is a great impediment to nutrition: for the lymph in those glands is a necessary constituent of the aliment. Arbuth. on Alim.

3. He that deputes another; as, the representatives in parliament disregard their constituents.

To CO'NSTITUTE, kŏn'stė-tūte. v. a. [constituo, Lat.]

1. To give formal existence; to make any thing what it is; to produce.

Prudence is not only a moral but christian virtue, such as is necessary to the constituting of all others. Decay of Piety.

2. To erect; to establish.

We must obey laws appointed and constituted by lawful authority, not against the law of God. Taylor's Holy Living.

It will be necessary to consider, how at first those several churches were constituted, that we may understand how in this one church they were all united. Pearson.

3. To depute; to appoint another to an office.

Co'NSTITUTER, kŏn'stė-tū'tŭr. n. s. [from constitute.] He that constitutes or appoints.

CONSTITU'TION, kŏn-stė-tū'shŭn. n. s. [from constitute.]

1. The act of constituting; enacting; deputing; establishing; producing.

2. State of being; particular texture of parts; natural qualities.

This is more beneficial than any other constitution. Bentley.

This light being trajected through the parallel prisms, if it suffered any change by the refraction of one, it lost that impression by the contrary refraction of the other; and so being restored to its pristine constitution, became of the same condition as at first. Newton's Opticks.

3. Corporeal frame.

Amongst many bad effects of this oily constitution, there is one advantage; such who arrive to age, are not subject to stricture of fibres. Arbuthnot.

4. Temper of body, with respect to health or disease.

If such men happen, by their native constitutions, to fall into the gout; either they mind it not at all, having no leisure to be sick, or they use it like a dog. Temple.

Beauty is nothing else but a just accord and harmony of the members, animated by a healthful constitution. Dryden.

5. Temper of mind.

Dametas, according to the constitution of a dull head, thinks no better way to shew himself wise than by suspecting every thing in his way. Sidney.

Some dear friend dead; else nothing in the world
Could turn so much the constitution
Of any constant man. Shaksp. Merchant of Venice.

He defended himself with undaunted courage, and less passion than was expected from his constitution. Clarendon.

6. Established form of government; system of laws and customs.

The Norman conquering all by might,
Mixing our customs, and the form of right,
With foreign constitutions he had brought. Daniel.

7. Particular law; established usage; establishment; institution.

We lawfully may observe the positive constitutions of our own churches. Hooker.

Constitution, properly speaking in the sense of the civil law, is that law which is made and ordained by some king or emperor; yet the canonists, by adding the word sacred to it, make it to signify the same as an ecclesiastical canon. Ayliffe.

CONSTITU'TIONAL, kŏn-stė-tū'shŭn-ăl. adj. [from constitution.]

1. Bred in the constitution; radical.

It is not probable any constitutional illness will be communicated with the small-pox by inoculation. Sharp's Surgery.

2. Consistent with the civil constitution; legal.

CONSTITU'TIVE, kŏn'stė-tū-tĭv. adj. [from constitute.]

1. That which constitutes any thing what it is; elemental; essential; productive.

Although it be placed among the non-naturals, that is, such as neither naturally constitutive nor merely destructive, do preserve or destroy. Brown.

The elements and constitutive parts of a schismatick, being the esteem of himself, and the contempt of others. Decay of Piety.

2. Having the power to enact or establish.

To CONSTRA'IN, kŏn-strāne'. v. a. [constraindre, Fr. constringo, Lat.]

1. To compel; to force to some action.

Thy sight, which should
Make our eyes flow with joy,
Constrains them weep. Shakspeare.

Namur subdued, is England's palm alone;
The rest besieg'd, but we constrain'd the town. Dryden.

2. To hinder by force; to restrain.

My sire in caves constrains the winds,
Can with a breath their clam'rous rage appease;
They fear his whistle, and forsake the seas. Dryd.

3. To necessitate.

The scars upon your honour, therefore, he
Does pity as constrained blemishes,
Nothing deserv'd. Shakspeare.

When to his lust Ægysthus gave the rein,
Did fate or we the adult'rous act constrain? Pope.

4. To violate; to ravish.

Her spotless chastity,
Inhuman traitors! you constrain'd and forc'd.
Shakspeare's Titus Andronicus.

5. To confine; to press.

When amidst the fervour of the feast,
The Tyrian hugs and fonds thee on her breast,
And with sweet kisses in her arms constrains,
Thou may'st infuse thy venom in her veins. Dryd.

How the strait stays the slender waist constrain. Gay.

6. To constringe.

When winter frosts constrain the field with cold,
The scanty root can take no steady hold. Dryden.

7. To tie; to bind,

Scarce the weary god had clos'd his eyes,
When rushing on with shouts, he binds in chains
The drowsy prophet, and his limbs constrains. Dryden.

8. To imprison.

Constrain'd him in a bird, and made him fly,
With party-colour'd plumes, a chattering pye. Dryden.

9. To force; to produce in opposition to nature.

In this northern tract our hoarser throats
Utter unripe and ill constrained notes. Waller.

10. To restrain; to withhold.

The soft weapons of paternal persuasions, after mankind began to forget the original giver of life, became overweak to resist the first inclination of evil: or after, when it became habitual, to constrain it. Raleigh.

CONSTRA'INABLE, kŏn-strā'nā-bl. adj. [from constrain.] Liable to constraint; obnoxious to compulsion.

Whereas men before stood bound in conscience to do as reason teacheth, they are now, by virtue of human law constrainable; and, if they outwardly transgress, punishable. Hooker.

CONSTRA'INEDLY, kŏn-strā'nĕd-lė. adv. [from constrain.] By constraint; by compulsion.

What occasion it had given them to think, to their greater obduration in evil, that through a froward and wanton desire of innovation we did constrainedly those things, for which conscience was pretended. Hooker.

CONSTRA'INER, kŏn-strā'nŭr. n. s. [from constrain.] He that constrains.

CONSTRA'INT, kŏn-strānt'. n. s. [contrainte, Fr.]

1. Compulsion; compelling force; violence; act of overruling the desire; confinement.

I did suppose it should be on constraint;
But, heav'n be thank'd, it is but voluntary. Shaksp. King John.

Like you, a man; and hither led by fame,
Not by constraint, but by my choice, I came. Dryden's Indian Emperour.

The constant desire of happiness, and the constraint it puts upon us to act for it, nobody, I think, accounts an abridgment of liberty. Locke.

2. Confinement. Out of use.

His limbs were waxen weak and raw,
Thro' long imprisonment, and hard constraint. Spenser.

To CONSTRI'CT, kŏn-strĭkt'. v. a. [constringo, constrictum, Lat.]

1. To bind; to cramp; to confine into a narrow compass.

2. To contract; to cause to shrink.

Such things as constrict the fibres, and strengthen the solid parts. Arbuth. on Diet.

CONSTRI'CTION, kŏn-strĭk'shŭn. n. s. [from constrict.] Contraction; compression; forcible contraction. Compression is from an outward force, constriction from some quality; as the throat is compressed by a bandage, and constringed by a cold.

The air, which these receive into the lungs, may serve to render their bodies equiponderant to the water; and the constriction or dilatation of it, may probably assist them to ascend or descend in the water. Ray on the Creation.

CONSTRI'CTOR, kŏn-strĭk'tŭr.[166] n. s. [constrictor, Lat.] That which compresses or contracts.

He supposed the constrictors of the eye-lids must be strengthened in the supercilious. Arbuthnot and Pope's Mart. Scrib.

To CONSTRI'NGE, kŏn-strĭnje'. v. a. [constringo, Lat.] To compress; to contract; to bind; to force to contract itself.

The dreadful spout,
Which shipmen do the hurricano call,
Constring'd in mass by the almighty sun. Shaksp.

Strong liquors, especially inflammatory spirits, intoxicate, constringe, harden the fibres, and coagulate the fluids. Arbuthnot.

CONSTRI'NGENT, kŏn-strĭn'jĕnt. adj. [constringens, Lat.] Having the quality of binding or compressing.

Try a deep well, or a conservatory of snow, where the cold may be more constringent. Bacon.

Winter binds
Our strengthen'd bodies in a cold embrace Constringent. Thomson's Winter.

To CONSTRU'CT, kŏn-strŭkt'. v. a. [constructus, Lat.]

1. To build; to form; to compile; to constitute

Let there be an admiration of those divine attributes and prerogatives, for whose manifesting he was pleased to construct this vast fabrick. Boyle.

2. To form by the mind: as, he constructed a new system.

CONSTRU'CTION, kŏn-strŭk'shŭn. n. s. [constructio, Lat.]

1. The act of building, or piling up in a regular method.
2. The form of building; structure; conformation.

There's no art
To shew the mind's construction in the face. Shaksp.

The ways were made of several layers of flat stones and flint: the construction was a little various, according to the nature of the soil, or the materials which they found. Arbuthnot.

3. [In grammar.] The putting of words, duly chosen, together in such a manner as is proper to convey a complete sense. Clarke's Latin Grammar.

Some particles constantly, and others in certain constructions, have the sense of a whole sentence contained in them. Locke.

4. The act of arranging terms in the proper order, by disentangling transpositions; the act of interpreting; explanation.

This label, whose containing
Is so from sense in hardness, that I can
Make no collection of it; let him shew
His skill in the construction. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

5. The sense; the meaning; interpretation.

In which sense although we judge the apostle's words to have been uttered, yet hereunto we do not require them to yield, that think any other construction more sound.. Hooker.

He that would live at ease, should always put the best construction on business and conversation. Collier on the Spleen.

Religion, in its own nature, produces good will towards men, and puts the mildest construction upon every accident that befals them. Spectator.

6. Judgment; mental representation.

It cannot, therefore, unto reasonable constructions seem strange, or savour of singularity, that we have examined this point. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

7. The manner of describing a figure or problem in geometry.
8. Construction of Equations, in algebra, is the method of reducing a known equation into lines and figures, in order to a geometrical demonstration.

CONSTRU'CTURE, kŏn-strŭk'tshŭre.[461] n. s. [from construct.] Pile; edifice; fabrick.

They shall the earth's constructure closely bind,
And to the centre keep the parts confin'd. Blackm.

To CO'NSTRUE, kŏn'strŭ, or kŏn'stŭr. v. a. [construo, Lat.]

1. To range words in their natural order; to disentangle transposition.

I'll teach mine eyes, with meek humility,
Love-learned letters to her eyes to read;
Which her deep wit, that true heart's thought can spell,
Will soon conceive, and learn to construe well. Spenser.

Construe the times to their necessities,
And you shall say, indeed, it is the time,
And not the king, that doth you injuries. Shaks.

2. To interpret; to explain; to shew the meaning.

I must crave that I be not so understood or construed, as if any such thing, by virtue thereof, could be done without the aid and assistance of God's most blessed spirit. Hooker.

Virgil is so very figurative, that he requires (I may almost say) a grammar apart to construe him. Dryden.

Thus we are put to construe and paraphrase our own words, to free ourselves either from the ignorance or malice of our adversaries. Stilling fleet.

When the word is construed into its idea, the double meaning vanishes. Addison.

To CO'NSTUPRATE, kŏn-stŭ-prāte. v. a. [constupro, Lat.] To violate; to debauch; to defile.

CONSTUPRA'TION, kŏn-stŭ-prā'shŭn. n. s. [from constuprate.] Violation; defilement.

CONSUBSTA'NTIAL, kŏn-sŭb-stăn'-shăl. adj. [consubstantialis, Lat.]

1. Having the same essence or substance.

The Lord our God is but one God: in which indivisible unity, notwithstanding we adore the Father, as being altogether of himself, we glorify that consubstantial Word, which is the Son; we bless and magnify that co-essential Spirit, eternally proceeding from both, which is the Holy Ghost. Hooker.

2. Being of the same kind or nature.

It continueth a body consubstantial with our bodies; a body of the same, both nature and measure, which it had on earth. Hooker.

In their conceits the human nature of Christ was not consubstantial to ours, but of another kind. Brerewood.

CONSUBSTANTIA'LITY, kŏn-sŭb-stăn-shè-ăl'ĕ-tè. n. s. [from consubstantial.]

The consular power had only the ornaments, without the force, of the royal authority. Spectator.

2. Consular Man. One who had been consul.

Rose not the consular men, and left their places,
So soon as thou sat'st down. Ben Jonson's Cataline.

CO'NSULATE, kŏn-shŭ-lāte.[91] n. s. [consulatus, Lat.] The office of consul.

His name and consulate were effaced out of all publick registers and inscriptions. Addison.

CO'NSULSHIP, kŏn'sŭl-shĭp. n. s. [from consul.] The office of consul.

The patricians should do very ill,
To let the consulship be so defil'd. Ben Jonson.

The lovely boy, with his auspicious face,
Shall Pollio's consulship and triumph grace. Dryd

To CONSU'LT, kŏn-sŭlt'. v. n. [consulto, Lat.] To take counsel together; to deliberate in common: it has with before the person admitted to consultation.

Every man,
After the hideous storm that follow'd, was
A thing inspir'd, and, not consulting, broke
Into a general prophecy, that this tempest,
Dashing the garment of this peace, aboded
The sudden breach on't. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

A senate house, wherein three hundred and twenty men sat consulting always for the people. 1 Mac. viii. 15.

Consult not with the slothful for any work. Ecclus. xxxvii.

He sent for his bosom friends, with whom he most confidently consulted, and shewed the paper to them, the contents whereof he could not conceive. Clarendon.

To CONSU'LT, kŏn-sŭlt'. v. a.

1. To ask advice of: as, he consulted his friends; to consult an author.
2. To regard; to act with view or respect to.

We are, in the first place, to consult the necessities of life, rather than matters of ornament and delight. L'Estrange.

The senate owes its gratitude to Cato,
Who with so great a soul consults its safety,
And guards our lives, while he neglects his own. Addison.

3. To plan; to contrive.

Thou hast consulted shame to thy house, by cutting off many people. Hab. ii. 10.

Many things were there consulted for the future, yet nothing was positively resolved. Clarendon.

CO'NSULT, kŏn'sŭlt, or kŏn'sŭlt'. n. s. [from the verb. It is variously accented.]

1. The act of consulting.

Yourself in person head one chosen half,
And march t' oppress the faction in consult
With dying Dorax. Dryden's Don Sebastian.

2. The effect of consulting; determination.

He said, and rose the first; the council broke;
And all their grave consults dissolv'd in smoke. Dryden's Fables.

3. A council; a number of persons assembled in deliberation.

Divers meetings and consults of our whole number, to consider of the former labours. Bacon.

A consult of coquets below
Was call'd, to rig him out a beau. Swift.

CONSULTA'TION, kŏn-sŭl-tā'shŭn. n. s. [from consult.]

1. The act of consulting; secret deliberation.

The chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes. Mark, xv. 1.

2. A number of persons consulting together; a council.

A consultation was called, wherein he advised a salivation. Wiseman of Abscesses.

3. [In law.] Consultatio is a writ, whereby a cause, being formerly removed by prohibition from the ecclesiastical court, or court christian, to the king's court, is returned thither again: for the judges of the king's court, if, upon comparing the libel with the suggestion of the party, they do find the suggestion false, or not proved, and therefore the cause to be wrongfully called from the court christian; then, upon this consultation or deliberation, decree is to be returned again. Cowell.

CONSU'LTER, kŏn-sŭl'tŭr.[98] n. s. [from consult.] One that consults, or asks counsel or intelligence.

There shall not be found among you a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard. Deut. xviii. 11.

CONSU'MABLE, kŏn-sū'mâ-bl. adj. [from consume.] Susceptible of destruction; possible to be wasted, spent, or destroyed.

Asbestos does truly agree in this common quality ascribed unto both, of being incombustible, and not consumable by fire; but it doth contract so much fuliginous matter from the earthy parts of the oil, though it was tried with some of the purest oil, that in a very few days it did choak and extinguish the flame. Wilkins's Mathematical Magick.

Our growing rich or poor depends only on, which is greater or less, our importation or exportation of consumable commodities. Locke.

To CONSU'ME, kŏn-sūme'.[454] v. a. [consumo, Lat.] To waste; to spend; to destroy.

Where two raging fires meet together,
They do consume the thing that feeds their fury.
Shakspeare.

Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in; for the locusts shall consume it. Deuteronomy xxviii.

Thus in soft anguish she consumes the day,
Nor quits her deep retirement. Thomson's Spring.

To CONSU'ME, kŏn-sūme'. v. n. To waste away; to be exhausted.

These violent delights have violent ends,
And in their triumph die; like fire and powder,
Which, as they meet, consume. Shakspeare.

CONSU'MER, kŏn-sū'mŭr. n. s. [from consume.] One that spends, wastes, or destroys any thing.

Money may be considered as in the hands of the consumer, or of the merchant who buys the commodity, when made to export. Locke.

To CONSU'MMATE, kŏn-sŭm'mâte.[91] v. a. [consommer, Fr. consummare, Lat.] To complete; to perfect; to finish; to end. Anciently accented on the first syllable.

Yourself, myself, and other lords, will pass
To consummate this business happily. Shaksp.

There shall we consummate our spousal rites. Shaksp.

The person was cunning enough to begin the deceit in the weaker, and the weaker sufficient to consummate the fraud in the stronger. Brown.

He had a mind to consummate the happiness of the day. Tatler.

CONSU'MMATE, kŏn-sŭm'mâte'. adj. [from the verb.] Complete; perfect; finished; omnibus numeris absolutus.

I do but stay till your marriage be consummate. Shaksp.

Earth, in her rich attire
Consummate, lovely smil'd. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Gratian, among his maxims for raising a man to the most consummate greatness, advises to perform extraordinary actions, and to secure a good historian. Addison's Freeholder.

If a man of perfect and consummate virtue falls into a misfortune, it raises our pity, but not our terrour. Addison's Spectator.

CONSUMMA'TION, kŏn-sŭm-mâ'shŭn. n. s. [from consummate.]

1. Completion; perfection; end.

That just and regular process, which it must be supposed to take from its original to its consummation. Addison's Spectator.

2. The end of the present system of things; the end of the world.

From the first beginning of the world unto the last consummation thereof, it neither hath been, nor can be, otherwise. Hooker.

3. Death; end of life.

Ghost, unlaid, forbear thee!
Nothing ill come near thee!
Quiet consummation have,
Unremoved be thy grave! Shaksp. Cymbeline.

CONSU'MPTION, kŏn-sŭm'shŭn.[412] n. s. [consumptio, Lat.]

1. The act of consuming; waste; destruction.

In commodities, the value rises as its quantity is less and vent greater; which depends upon its being preferred in its consumption. Locke.

2. The state of wasting or perishing.

Etna and Vesuvius have sent forth flames for this two or three thousand years, yet the mountains themselves have not suffered any considerable diminution or consumption; but are, at this day, the highest mountains in those countries. Woodward.

3. [In physick.] A waste of muscular flesh. It is frequently attended with a hectick fever, and is divided by physicians into several kinds, according to the variety of its causes. Quincy.

Consumption sow
In hollow bones of man. Shaksp. Timon.

The stoppage of women's courses, if not locked to, sets them into a consumption, dropsy, or other disease. Harvey.

The essential and distinguishing character of a confirmed consumption, is a wasting of the body by reason of an ulcerated state of the lungs, attended with a cough, a discharge of purulent matter, and a hectick fever. Blackmore.

CONSU'MPTIVE, kŏn-sŭm'tĭv. adj. [from consume.]

1. Destructive; wasting; exhausting; having the quality of consuming.

2. Diseased with a consumption.

Nothing taints sound lungs sooner than inspiring the breath of consumptive lungs. Harvey.

The lean, consumptive wench, with coughs decay'd,
Is call'd a pretty, tight, and slender maid. Dryden.

By an exact regimen a consumptive person may hold out for years. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CONSU'MPTIVENESS, kŏn-sŭm'tĭv-nĕs. n. s. [from consumptive.] A tendency to a consumption.

CONSU'TILE, kŏn-sū'tĭl.[140] adj. [consutilis, Lat.] That is sewed or stitched together. Dict.

To CONTA'BULATE, kŏn-tăb'ŭ-lâte. v. a. [contabulo, Lat.] To floor with boards.

CO'NTACT, kŏn'tăkt. n. s. [contactus, Lat.] Touch; close union; juncture of one body to another.

The Platonists hold, that the spirit of the lover doth pass into the spirits of the person loved, which causeth the desire of return into the body; whereupon followeth that appetite of contact and conjunction. Bacon's Natural Hist.

When the light fell so obliquely on the air, which in other places was between them, as to be all reflected, it seemed in that place of contact to be wholly transmitted. Newton's Opticks.

The air, by its immediate contact, may coagulate the blood which flows along the air-bladders. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CONTA'CTION, kŏn-tăk'shŭn. n. s. [contactus, Lat.] The act of touching; a joining one body to another.

That deleterious it may be at some distance, and destructive without corporal contaction, there is no high improbability. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CONTA'GION, kŏn-tâ'jĕ-ŭn.[542] n. s [contagio, Lat.]

1. The emission from body to body by which diseases are communicated.

If we two be one, and thou play false,
I do digest the poison of thy flesh,
Being strumpeted by thy contagion. Shaksp.

In infection and contagion from body to body, as the plague and the like, the infection is received many times by the body passive; but yet is, by the strength and good disposition thereof, repulsed. Bacon.

2. Infection; propagation of mischief, or disease.

Nor will the goodness of intention excuse the scandal and contagion of example. King Charles

Down fell they,
And the dire hiss renew'd, and the dire form
Catch'd by contagion. Milton's Par. Lost.

3. Pestilence; venomous emanations.

Will he steal out of his wholesome bed,
To dare the vile contagion of the night? Shak.

CONTA'GIOUS, kŏn-tâ'jĕ-ŭs.[542] adj. [from contagio, Lat.] Infectious; caught by approach; poisonous; pestilential.

The jades,
That drag the tragick melancholy night,
From their misty jaws
Breathe foul, contagious darkness in the air. Shaksp.

We sicken soon from her contagious care,
Grieve for her sorrows, groan for her despair. Prior.

CONTA'GIOUSNESS, kŏn-tâ'jĕ-ŭs-nĕs. n. s. [from contagious.] The quality of being contagious.

To CONTA'IN, kŏn-tâne'. v. a. [contineo, Lat.]

1. To hold as a vessel.

There are many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. John, xxi. 25.

Gently instructed I shall hence depart,
Greatly in peace of thought, and have my fill
Of knowledge what this vessel can contain. Milton.

What thy stores contain bring forth, and pour Abundance. Milton.

2. To comprehend; to comprise.

What seem'd fair in all the world, seem'd now
Mean, or in her summ'd up, in her contain'd. Milton.

The earth,
Though in comparison of heav'n so small,
Nor glist'ring, may of solid good contain
More plenty than the sun, that barren shines. Milton

3. To comprise, as a writing.

Wherefore also it is contain'd in the scripture. 1 Pet. ii. 6

4. To restrain; to withhold; to keep within bounds.

All men should be contained in duty ever after, without the terrour of warlike forces. Spenser

Their king's person contains the unruly people from evil occasions. Spenser.

I tell you, sirs,
If you should smile, he grows impatient.——
—Fear not, my lord, we can contain ourselves. Shaksp.

To CONTA'IN, kŏn-tâne'. v. n. To live in continence.

I felt the ardour of my passion increase, till I could no longer contain. Arbuthnot and Pope.

CONTA'INABLE, kŏn-tā'-nā-bl. adj. [from contain.] Possible to be contained.

The air, containable within the cavity of the eolipile, amounted to eleven grains. Boyle.

To CONTA'MINATE, kŏn-tăm'ĕ-nāte.[91] v. a. [contamino, Lat.] To defile; to pollute; to corrupt by base mixture.

Shall we now
Contaminate our fingers with base bribes? Shaksp.
A base pander holds the chamber-door,
Whilst by a slave, no gentler than a dog,
His fairest daughter is contaminated. Shaksp.
Do it not with poison; strangle her in bed,
Even in the bed she hath contaminated. Shakspeare.
I quickly shed
Some of his bastard blood, and in disgrace
Bespoke him thus: contaminated, base,
And misbegotten blood I spill of thine. Shakspeare.

Though it be necessitated, by its relation to flesh, to a terrestrial converse; yet 'tis, like the sun, without contaminating its beams. Glanville's Apology.

He that lies with another man's wife, propagates children in another's family for him to keep, and contaminates the honour thereof as much as in him lies. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONTAMINA'TION, kŏn-tăm-ĕ-nā'shŭn. n. s [from contaminate.] Pollution; defilement.

CONTE'MERATED, kŏn-tĕm'ĕ-rā-tĕd. adj. [contemeratus, Lat.] Violated; polluted. Dict.

To CONTE'MN, kŏn-tĕm'.[411] v. a. [contemno, Lat.] To despise; to scorn; to slight; to disregard; to neglect; to defy.

Yet better thus, and known to be contemned,
Than still contemned and flattered. Shakspeare.

Eve, thy contempt of life and pleasure seems
To argue in thee something more sublime
And excellent than what thy mind contemns. Milton.

Pygmalion then the Tyrian sceptre sway'd,
One who contemn'd divine and human laws;
Then strife ensued. Dryden's Virgil's Æneid.

CONTE'MNER, kŏn-tĕm'nŭr.[411] n. s. [from contemn.] One that contemns; a despiser; a scorner.

He counsels him to prosecute innovators of worship, not only as contemners of the gods, but disturbers of the state. South.

To CONTE'MPER, kŏn-tĕm'pŭr. v. a. [contempero, Lat.] To moderate; to reduce to a lower degree by mixing something of opposite qualities.

The leaves qualify and contemper the heat, and hinder the evaporation of moisture. Ray.

CONTE'MPERAMENT, kŏn-tĕm'pŭr-ă-mĕnt. n. s. [from contempero, Lat.] The degree of any quality.

There is nearly an equal contemperament of the warmth of our bodies to that of the hottest part of the atmosphere. Derham.

To CONTE'MPERATE, kŏn-tĕm'pŭr-āte. v. a. [from contemper.] To diminish any quality by something contrary; to moderate; to temper.

The mighty Nile and Niger do not only moisten and contemperate the air, but refresh and humectate the earth. Brown.

If blood abound, let it out, regulating the patient's diet, and contemperating the humours. Wiseman.

CONTEMPERA'TION, kŏn-tĕm-pŭr-ā'shŭn. n. s. [from contemperate.]

1. The act of diminishing any quality by admixture of the contrary; the act of moderating or tempering.

The use of air, without which there is no continuation in life, is not nutrition, but the contemperation of fervour in the heart. Brown's Vulg. Err.

2. Proportionate mixture; proportion.

There is not greater variety in men's faces, and in the contemperations of their natural humours, than there is in their phantasies. Hale.

To CONTE'MPLATE, kŏn-tĕm'plāte. v. a. [contemplor, Lat. This seems to have been once accented on the first syllable.] To consider with continued attention; to study; to meditate.

There is not much difficulty in confining the mind to contemplate what we have a great desire to know. Watts.

To CONTE'MPLATE, kŏn-tĕm'plāte. v. n. To muse; to think studiously with long attention.

So many hours must I take my rest;
So many hours must I contemplate. Shakspeare.

Sapor had an heaven of glass, which he trod upon, contemplating over the same as if he had been Jupiter. Peacham.

How can I consider what belongs to myself, when I have been so long contemplating on you? Dryden.

CONTEMPLA'TION, kŏn-tĕm-plā'shŭn. n. s. [from contemplate.]

1. Meditation; studious thought on any subject; continued attention.

How now? what serious contemplation are you in? Shakspeare.

Contemplation is keeping the idea, which is brought into the mind, for some time actually in view. Locke.

2. Holy meditation; a holy exercise of the soul, employed in attention to sacred things.

I have breath'd a sacred vow
To live in prayer and contemplation,
Only attended by Nerissa here. Shakspeare.

3. The faculty of study: opposed to the power of action.

There are two functions, contemplation and practice, according to that general division of objects; some of which entertain our speculation, others employ our actions. South.

CONTE'MPLATIVE, kŏn-tĕm'plā-tĭv. adj. [from contemplate.]

1. Given to thought or study; studious; thoughtful.

Fixt and contemplative their looks,
Still turning over nature's books. Denham.

2. Employed in study; dedicated to study;

I am no courtier, nor versed in state affairs: my life hath rather been contemplative than active. Bacon.

Contemplative men may be without the pleasure of discovering the secrets of state, and men of action are commonly without the pleasure of tracing the secrets of divine art. Grew's Cosmologia.

3. Having the power of thought or meditation.

So many kinds of creatures might be to exercise the contemplative faculty of man. Ray.

CONTE'MPLATIVELY, kŏn-tĕm'plā-tĭv-lĕ. adv. [from contemplative.] Thoughtfully; attentively; with deep attention.

CONTEMPLA'TOR, kŏn-tĕm'plā-tŭr.[521] n. s. [Lat.] One employed in study; an inquirer after knowledge; a student.

In the Persian tongue the word magus imports as much as a contemplator of divine and heavenly science. Raleigh's History.

The Platonick contemplators reject both these descriptions, founded upon parts and colours. Brown.

CONTE'MPORARY, kŏn-tĕm'pŏ-rā-rĕ. adj. [contemporain, Fr.]

1. Living in the same age; coetaneous.

Albert Durer was contemporary to Lucas. Dryd

2. Born at the same time.

A grove born with himself he sees,

3. Existing at the same point of time.

It is impossible to make the ideas of yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow, to be the same; or bring ages past and future together, and make them contemporary. Locke.

CONTE'MPORARY, kŏn-tĕm'pŏ-rā-rĕ.[512] n. s. One who lives at the same time with another.

All this in blooming youth you have achiev'd;
Nor are your foil'd contemporaries griev'd. Dryden.

As he has been favourable to me, he will hear of his kindness from our contemporaries; for we are fallen into an age illiterate, censorious and detracting. Dryden's Juv. Preface.

The active part of mankind, as they do most for the good of their contemporaries, very deservedly gain the greatest share in their applauses. Addison.

To CONTE'MPORISE, kŏn-tĕm'pŏ-rize.[153] v. a. [con and tempus, Lat.] To make contemporary; to place in the same age.

The indifferency of their existences, contemporised into our actions, admits a farther consideration. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CONTE'MPT, kŏn-tĕmt'.[412] n. s. [contemptus, Lat.]

1. The act of despising others; slight regard; scorn.

It was neither in contempt nor pride that I did not bow. Esther.

The shame of being miserable,
Exposes men to scorn and base contempt,
Even from their nearest friends. Denham.

There is no action, in the behaviour of one man towards another, of which human nature is more impatient than of contempt; it being an undervaluing of a man, upon a belief of his utter uselessness and inability, and a spiteful endeavour to engage the rest of the world in the same slight esteem of him. South.

His friend smil'd scornful, and with proud contempt
Rejects as idle what his fellow dreamt. Dryden.

Nothing, says Longinus, can be great, the contempt of which is great. Addison.

2. The state of being despised; vileness.

The place was like to come into contempt. 2 Maccabees, iii. 18.

CONTE'MPTIBLE, kŏn-tĕm'tĕ-bl. adj. [from contempt.]

From no one vice exempt
And most contemptible to shun contempt. Pope.

2. Despised; scorned; neglected.

There is not so contemptible a plant or animal, that does not confound the most enlarged understanding. Locke.

3. Scornful; apt to depise; contemptuous. This is no proper use.

If she should make tender of her love, 'tis very possible he'll scorn it; for the man hath a contemptible spirit. Shakspeare.

CONTE'MPTIBLENESS, kŏn-tĕm'tĕ-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from contemptible.] The state of being contemptible; the state of being despised; meanness; vileness; baseness; cheapness.

Who, by a steady practice of virtue, comes to discern the contemptibleness of baits wherewith he allures us. Decay of Piety.

CONTE'MPTIBLY, kŏn-tĕm'tĕ-blĕ. adv. [from contemptible.] Meanly; in a manner deserving contempt.

Know'st thou not
Their language, and their ways? They also know
And reason not contemptibly. Milton's Par. Lost.

CONTE'MPTUOUS, kŏn-tĕm'tshŭ-ŭs.[461] adj. [from contempt.] Scornful; apt to despise; using words or actions of contempt; insolent.

To neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the peace which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and even a contemptuous laughing to scorn and deriding of God, his laws, and precepts. Raleigh's History of the World.

Some much averse I found, and wond'rous harsh,
Contemptuous, proud, set on revenge and spite. Milt.

Rome the proudest part of the heathen world, entertained the most contemptuous opinion of the Jews. Atterbury.

CONTE'MPTUOUSLY, kŏn tĕm'tshŭ-ŭs-lĕ. adv. [from contemptuous.] With scorn; with despite; scornfully; despitefully.

I throw my name against the bruising stone,
Trampling contemptuously on thy diadem. Shaksp.

The apostles and most eminent Christians were poor, and used contemptuously. Taylor.

If he governs tyrannically in youth, he will be treated contemptuously in age; and the baser his enemies, the more intolerable the affront. L'Estrange.

A wise man would not speak contemptuously of a prince, though out of his dominions. Tillotson.

CONTE'MPTUOUSNESS, kŏn-tĕm'tshŭ-ŭs-nĕs. n. s. [from contemptuous.] Disposition to contempt; insolence. Dict.

1. A frame of beams joined together; a story.

We mean a porch, or cloister, or the like, of one contignation, and not in storied buildings. Wotton.

Where more of the orders than one shall be set in several stories or contignations, there must be an exquisite care to place the columns one over another. Wotton.

2. The act of framing or joining a fabrick of wood.

CONTIGU'ITY, kŏn-tĕ-gū'ĕ-tĕ. n. s. [from contiguous.] Actual contact; situation in which two bodies or countries touch upon each other.

He defined magnetical attraction to be a natural imitation and disposition conforming unto contiguity. Brown.

The immediate contiguity of that convex were a real space. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

CONTI'GUOUS, kŏn-tĭg'ū-ŭs. adj. [contiguus, Lat.]

1. Meeting so as to touch; bordering upon each other; not separate.

Flame doth not mingle with flame as air doth with air, or water with water, but only remaineth contiguous; as it cometh to pass betwixt consisting bodies. Bacon's Natural History.

The loud misrule
Of chaos far remov'd; lest fierce extremes,
Contiguous, might distemper the whole frame.
Milton.

The East and West,
Upon the globe, a mathematick point
Only divides: thus happiness and misery,
And all extremes, are still contiguous. Denham.

Distinguish them by the diminution of the lights and shadows, joining the contiguous objects by the participation of their colours. Dryden.

When I viewed it too near, the two halfs of the paper did not appear fully divided from one another, but seemed contiguous at one of their angles. Newton's Opticks.

2. It has sometimes with.

Water, being contiguous with air, cooleth it, but moisteneth it not. Bacon's Natural History.

No contraries hold more antipathy,
Than I and such a knave. Shaksp. King Lear.

He sung
Why contraries feed thunder in the cloud.
Cowley's Davideis.

Honour should be concern'd in honour's cause;
That is not to be cur'd by contraries,
As bodies are, whose health is often drawn
From rankest poisons. Southern's Oroonoko.

2. A proposition contrary to some other; a fact contrary to the allegation.

The instances brought by our author are but slender proofs of a right to civil power and dominion in the first-born, and do rather shew the contrary. Locke.

3. On the contrary. In opposition; on the other side.

He pleaded still not guilty:
The king's attorney, on the contrary,
Urg'd on examination, proofs, confessions,
Of diverse witnesses. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

If justice stood on the side of the single person, it ought to give good men pleasure to see that right should take place; but when, on the contrary, the commonweal of a whole nation is overborn by private interest, what good man but must lament? Swift.

4. To the contrary. To a contrary purpose; to an opposite intent.

They did it, not for want of instruction to the contrary. Stillingfleet.

To Co'NTRARY, kŏn'trâ-rė. v. a. [contrarier, Fr.] To oppose; to thwart; to contradict.

Incense and nidorous smells, such as were of sacrifices, were thought to intoxicate the brain, and to dispose men to devotion; which they may do by a kind of sadness and contristation of the spirits, and partly also by heating and exalting them. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

CONTRI'TE, kŏn'trite.[140] adj. [contritus, Lat.]

1. Bruised; much worn.

2. Worn with sorrow; harassed with the sense of guilt; penitent. In the books of divines, contrite is sorrowful for sin, from the love of God and desire of pleasing him; and attrite is sorrowful for sin, from the fear of punishment.

I Richard's body have interred now;
And on it have bestowed more contrite tears,
Than from it issued forced drops of blood. Shaksp.

With tears
Wat'ring the ground, and with our sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek. Milton.

The contrite sinner is restored to pardon, and, through faith in Christ, our repentance is entitled to salvation. Rogers.

CONTRI'TENESS, kŏn'trite-nĕs. n. s. [from contrite.] Contrition; repentance. Dict.

CONTRI'TION, kôn-trîsh'ûn. n. s. [from contrite.]

1. The act of grinding, or rubbing to powder.

Some of those coloured powders, which painters use, may have their colours a little changed, by being very elaborately and finely ground; where I see not what can be justly pretended for those changes, besides the breaking of their parts into less parts by that contrition. Newton's Opticks,

2. Penitence; sorrow for sin: in the strict sense, the sorrow which arises from the desire to please God; distinguished from attrition, or imperfect repentance produced by dread of hell.

What is sorrow and contrition for sin? A being grieved with the conscience of sin, not only that we have thereby incurred such danger, but also that we have so unkindly grieved and provoked so good a God. Hammond.

Fruits of more pleasing savour, from thy seed
Sown with contrition in his heart, than those
Which, his own hand manuring, all the trees
Of Paradise could have produc'd. Milton.

Your fasting, contrition, and mortification, when the church and state appoints, and that especially in times of greater riot and luxury. Spratt.

My future days shall be one whole contrition;
A chapel will I build with large endowment,
Where every day an hundred aged men
Shall all hold up their wither'd hands to heav'n.
Dryden.

CONTRI'VABLE, kôn-trî'vâ-bl. adj. [from contrive.] Possible to be planned by the mind; possible to be invented and adjusted.

It will hence appear how a perpetual motion may seem easily contrivable. Wilkins's Dædalus.

CONTRI'VANCE, kôn-trî'vânse. n. s. [from contrive.]

1. The act of contriving; excogitation; the thing contrived.

There is no work impossible to these contrivances, but there may be as much acted by this art as can be fancied by imagination. Wilkins.

Instructed, you'll explore
Divine contrivance, and a God adore. Blackmore.

2. Scheme; plan; disposition of parts or causes.

Our bodies are made according to the most curious artifice, and orderly contrivance. Glanville.

3. A conceit; a plot; an artifice.

Have I not manag'd my contrivance well,
To try your love, and make you doubt of mine?
Dryden.

There might be a feint, a contrivance in the matter, to draw him into some secret ambush. Atter.

To CONTRI'VE, kôn-trîve'. v. a. [controuver, Fr.]

1. To plan out; to excogitate.

One that slept in the contriving lust, and waked to do it. Shaksp. King Lear.

What more likely to contrive this admirable frame of the universe than infinite wisdom? Tillotson.

Our poet has always some beautiful design, which he first establishes, and then contrives the means which will naturally conduct him to his end. Dryden.

2. To wear away. Out of use.

Three ages, such as mortal men contrive.
Fairy Queen.

Please ye, we may contrive this afternoon,
And quaff carouses to our mistress' health. Shak.

To CONTRI'VE, kôn-trîve'. v. n. To form or design; to plan; to scheme; to complot.

Is it enough
That masking habits, and a borrow'd name,
Contrive to hide my plenitude of shame? Prior.

CONTRI'VEMENT, kôn-trîve'mênt. n. s. [from contrive.] Invention. Dict.

CONTRI'VER, kôn-trî'vûr.[98] n. s. [from contrive.] An inventer; one that plans a design; a schemer.

The close contriver of all harms,
Was never call'd to bear my part. Shak. Macb.

Epeus, who the fraud's contriver was. Denham.

Plain loyalty, not built on hope,
I leave to your contriver, Pope:
None loves his king and country better,
Yet none was ever less their debtor. Swift.

Scenes of blood and desolation, I had painted as the common effects of those destructive machines; whereof, he said, some evil genius, enemy to mankind, must have been the first contriver.
Swift's Gulliver's Travels.

CONTRO'L, kôn-trôll'.[406] n. s. [controle, that is, contre role, Fr.]

1. A register or account kept by another officer, that each may be examined by the other.

2. Check; restraint.

Let partial spirits still aloud complain,
Think themselves injur'd that they cannot reign;
And own no liberty, but where they may,
Without control, upon their fellows prey. Waller.

He shall feel a force upon himself from within, and from the control of his own principles, to engage him to do worthily. South.

If the sinner shall win so complete a victory over his conscience, that all those considerations shall be able to strike no terrour into his mind, lay no restraint upon his lusts, no control upon his appetites, he is certainly too strong for the means of grace.
South's Sermons.

Speak, what Phœbus has inspir'd thy soul
For common good, and speak without control.
Dryden's Homer.

3. Power; authority; superintendence.

The beasts, the fishes, and the winged fowls,
Are their males' subjects, and at their controls.
Shakspeare.

To CONTRO'L, kôn-trôll'.[406] v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To keep under check by a counter-reckoning.

2. To govern; to restrain; to subject.

Authority to convent, to control, to punish, as far as with excommunication, whomsoever they think worthy. Hooker.

Give me a staff of honour for mine age;
But not a sceptre to control the world. Shaksp.

Who shall control me for my works? Eccl. v. 3.

I feel my virtue struggling in my soul:
But stronger passion does its power control. Dryd.

With this he did a herd of goats control,
Which by the way he met, and slily stole;
Clad like a country swain he pip'd and sung,
And playing drove his jolly troop along. Dryden.

O, dearest Andrew, says the humble droll,
Henceforth may I obey, and thou control. Prior.

3. To overpower; to confute: as, he controlled all the evidence of his adversary.

As for the time while he was in the Tower, and the manner of his brother's death, and his own escape, she knew they were things that a very few could control. Bacon's Henry VII.

CONTRO'LLABLE, kôn-trôll'â-bl. adj. [from control.] Subject to control; subject to command; subject to be over-ruled.

Passion is the drunkenness of the mind, and therefore, in its present workings, not controllable by reason. South.

CONTRO'LLER, kôn-trôll'ûr. n. s. [from control.] One that has the power of governing or restraining; a superintendent.

He does not calm his contumelious spirit,
Nor cease to be an arrogant controller. Shaksp.

The great controller of our fate
Deign'd to be man, and liv'd in low estate. Dryd.

CONTRO'LLERSHIP, kôn-trôll'ûr-ship. n. s. [from controller.] The office of a controller.

4. Resistance; hostility.

Here have we war for war, and blood for blood, Controlment for controlment. Shaksp. King John.

CONTROVE'RSIAL, kôn-trô-vêr'shâl. adj. [from controversy.] Relating to disputes; disputatious.

It happens in controversial discourses as it does in the assaulting of towns, where, if the ground be but firm whereon the batteries are erected, there is no farther enquiry whom it belongs to, so it affords but a fit rise for the present purpose. Locke.

CO'NTROVERSY, kôn-trô-vêr-sê. n. s. [controversia, Lat.]

1. Dispute; debate; agitation of contrary opinions: a dispute is commonly oral, and a controversy in writing.

How cometh it to pass that we are so rent with mutual contentions, and that the church is so much troubled? If men had been willing to learn, all these controversies might have died the very day they were first brought forth. Hooker.

Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. 1 Timothy.

Wild controversy then, which long had slept,
Into the press from ruin'd cloisters leapt. Denham.

2. A suit in law.

If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked. Deuteronomy, xxv. 1.

3. A quarrel.

The Lord hath a controversy with the nations.
Jer. xxv. 31.

4. Opposition; enmity. This is an unusual sense.

The torrent roar'd, and we did buffet it
With lusty sinews; throwing it aside,
And stemming it with hearts of controversy. Shak.

To CO'NTROVERT, kôn'trô-vêrt. v. a. [controverto, Lat.] To debate; to ventilate in opposite books; to dispute any thing in writing.

If any person shall think fit to controvert them, he may do it very safely for me. Cheyne.

Hooker seems to use the word controverse, if it be not an erratum.

Persuasion ought to be fully settled in men's hearts, that, in litigations and controversed causes of such quality, the will of God is to have them to do whatsoever the sentence of judicial and final decision shall determine. Hooker.

CONTROVE'RTIBLE, kôn-trô-vêrt'ê-bl. adj. [from controvert.] Disputable; that may be the cause of controversy.

Discoursing of matters dubious, and many controvertible truths, we cannot without arrogancy intreat a credulity, or implore any farther assent than the probability of our reasons and verity of our experiments. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CONTROVE'RTIST, kŏn'trō-vĕr-tĭst. n. s. [from controvert.] Disputant; a man versed or engaged in literary wars or disputations.

With scoffs and scorns, and contumelious taunts,
In open market-place produc'd they me
To be a publick spectacle. Shaksp. Henry VI.

In all the quarrels and tumults at Rome, though the people frequently proceeded to rude contumelious language, yet no blood was ever drawn in any popular commotions, till the time of the Gracchi. Swift.

2. Inclined to utter reproach or practise insults; brutal; rude.

There is yet another sort of contumelious persons, who indeed are not chargeable with that circumstance of ill employing their wit; for they use none of it. Government of the Tongue.

Given our holy virgins to the stain
Of contumelious, beastly, madbrain'd war. Shaksp.

3. Productive of reproach; shameful; ignominious.

As it is in the highest degree injurious to them, so it is contumelious to him. Decay of Piety.

CONTUME'LIOUSLY, kŏn-tū-mē'lē-ŭs-lĕ adv. [from contumelious.] Reproachfully; contemptuously; rudely.

The people are not wont to take so great offence, when they are excluded from honours and offices, as when their persons are contumeliously trodden upon. Hooker.

Fie, lords! that you, being supreme magistrates,
Thus contumeliously should break the peace. Shaksp.

CONTUME'LIOUSNESS, kŏn-tū-mē'lē-ŭs-nĕs n. s. [contumelious.] Rudeness; reproach.

CO'NTUMELY, kŏn'tū-mē-lē. n. s. [contumelia, Lat.] Rudeness; contemptuousness; bitterness of language; reproach.

If the helm of chief government be in the hands of a few of the wealthiest, then laws, providing for continuance thereof, must make the punishment of contumely and wrong, offered unto any of the common sort, sharp and grievous, that so the evil may be prevented. Hooker.

Th' oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pang of despis'd love, the law's delay. Shak.

It was undervalued and depressed with some bitterness and contumely. Clarendon.

Why should any man be troubled at the contumelies of those, whose judgment deserves not to be valued? Tillotson.

Eternal contumely attend that guilty title, which claims exemption from thought, and arrogates to its wearers the prerogative of brutes. Addis. Guard.

To CONTU'SE, kŏn-tūze'.[437] v. a. [contusus, Lat.]

1. To beat together: to bruise.

Of their roots, barks, and seeds, contused together, and mingled with other earths, and well watered with warm water, there came forth herbs much like the other. Bacon.

2. To bruise the flesh without a breach of the continuity.

The ligature contuses the lips in cutting them, so that they require to be digested before they can unite. Wiseman.

CONTU'SION, kŏn-tū'zhŭn. n. s. [from contusio.]

1. The act of beating or bruising.

2. The state of being beaten or bruised.

Take a piece of glass, and reduce it to powder, it acquiring by contusion a multitude of minute surfaces, from a diaphanous, degenerates into a white body. Boyle on Colours.

3. A bruise; a compression of the fibres, distinguished from a wound.

That winter lion, who in rage forgets
Aged contusions, and all bruise of time. Shaksp.

The bones, in sharp colds, wax brittle; and all contusions, in hard weather, are more difficult to cure. Bacon.

And unrespective boys: none are for me,
That look into me with considerate eyes. Shaksp.

Men then come to be furnished with fewer or more simpler ideas from without, according as the objects they converse with afford greater or less variety. Locke.

3. To convey the thoughts reciprocally in talk.

Go therefore half this day, as friend with friend,
Converse with Adam. Milt. Par. Lost.

Much less can bird with beast, or fish with fowl,
So well converse. Milt. Par. Lost.

4. To discourse familiarly upon any subject: with on before the thing.

We had conversed so often on that subject, and he had communicated his thoughts of it so fully to me, that I had not the least remaining difficulty. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

5. To have commerce with a different sex.

Being asked by some of her sex, in how long a time a woman might be allowed to pray to the gods, after having conversed with a man? If it were a husband, says she, the next day; if a stranger, never. Guardian.

Co'NVERSE, kŏn'vêrse.[492] n. s. [from the verb. It is sometimes accented on the first syllable, sometimes on the last. Pope has used both: the first is more analogical.]

1. Conversation; manner of discoursing in familiar life.

His converse is a system fit
Alone to fill up all her wit. Swift.

Gen'rous converse, a soul exempt from pride
And love to praise with reason on his side. Pope.

Form'd by thy converse happily to steer
From grave to gay, from lively to severe. Pope.

2. Acquaintance; cohabitation; familiarity.

Though it be necessitated, by its relation to flesh, to a terrestrial converse; yet it is, like the sun, without contaminating its beams. Glanville.

By such a free converse, with persons of different sects, we shall find that there are persons of good sense and virtue, persons of piety and worth. Watts.

3. [In geometry; from conversus.] A proposition is said to be the converse of another, when, after drawing a conclusion from something first proposed, we proceed to suppose what had been before concluded, and to draw from it what had been supposed. Thus, if two sides of a triangle be equal, the angles opposite to those sides are also equal: the converse of the proposition is, that if two angles of a triangle be equal, the sides opposite to those angles are also equal. Chambers.

Conve'rsely, kŏn-vêrse'lê. adv. [from converse.] With change of order; in a contrary order; reciprocally.

Conve'rsion, kŏn-vêr'shŭn. n. s. [conversio, Lat.]

1. Change from one state into another; transmutation.

Artificial conversion of water into ice, is the work of a few hours; and this of air may be tried by a month's space. Bacon.

There are no such natural gradations, and conversions of one metal and mineral into another, in the earth, as many have fancied. Woodward.

The conversion of the aliment into fat, is not properly nutrition. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Change from reprobation to grace, from a bad to a holy life.

They passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles. Acts, xv. 4.

3. Change from one religion to another.

4. The interchange of terms is an argument; as, no virtue is vice; no vice is virtue. Chambers.

5. Conversion of Equations, in algebra, is the reducing of a fractional equation into an integral one.

Conve'rsive, kŏn-vêr'sîv. adj. [from converse.] Conversable; sociable.

To CONVE'RT, kŏn-vêrt'. v. a. [converto, Lat.]

1. To change into another substance; to transmute.

If the whole atmosphere was converted into water, it would make no more than eleven yards water about the earth. Burnet.

2. To change from one religion to another.

Augustine is converted by St. Ambrose's sermon, when he came to it on no such design. Hammond.

3. To turn from a bad to a good life.

He which converteth the sinner from the errour of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. James, v. 20.

Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee. Psalm li. 13.

4. To turn towards any point.

Crystal will callify into electricity, and convert the needle freely placed. Brown.

5. To apply to any use; to appropriate.

The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee. Isaiah, lx. 5.

He acquitted himself not like an honest man; for he converted the prizes to his own use. Arbuthnot.

6. To change one proposition into another, so that what was the subject of the first becomes the predicate of the second.

The papists cannot abide this proposition converted: all sin is a transgression of the law; but every transgression of the law is sin. The apostle therefore turns it for us: all unrighteousness, says he, is sin, but every transgression of the law is unrighteousness, says Austin, upon the place. Hale.

To Conve'rt, kŏn-vêrt'. v. n. To undergo a change; to be transmuted.

The love of wicked friends converts to fear:
That fear, to hate. Shaks. Rich. II.

They rub out of it a red dust which converteth into worms, which they kill with wine. Sandys.

Co'NVERT, kŏn'vêrt. n. s. [from the verb.] A person converted from one opinion or one practice to another.

The Jesuits did not persuade the converts to lay aside the use of images. Stillingfleet.

When Platonism prevailed, the converts to Christianity of that school interpreted Holy Writ according to that philosophy. Locke.

Let us not imagine that the first converts only of Christianity were concerned to defend their religion. Rogers.

Conve'rter, kŏn-vêrt'ûr. n. s. [from convert.] One that makes converts.

Convertibi'lity, kŏn-vêr-tê-bîl'ê-tê. n. s. [from convertible.] The quality of being possible to be converted.

Conve'rtible, kŏn-vêr'tê-bl. adj. [from convert.]

1. Susceptible of change; transmutable; capable of transmutation.

Minerals are not convertible into another species, though of the same genus; nor reducible into another genus. Harvey.

The gall is not an alkali; but it is alkalescent, conceptible and convertible into a corrosive alkali. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. So much alike as that one may be used for the other.

Though it be not the real essence of any substance, it is the specifick essence, to which our name belongs, and is convertible with it. Locke.

Many, that call themselves Protestants, look upon our worship to be idolatrous as well as that of the Papists; and put prelacy and popery together, as terms convertible. Swift.

Conve'rtibly, kŏn-vêr'tê-blê. adv. [from convertible.] Reciprocally; with interchange of terms.

There never was any person ungrateful, who was not also proud; nor, convertibly, any one proud, who was not equally ungrateful. South's Sermons.

Co'nvertite, kŏn'vêr-tite.[156] [503] n. s. [converti, Fr.] A convert; one converted from another opinion. Not in use.

Since you are a gentle convertite,
My tongue shall hush again this storm of war.
Shaksp. King John.

Nor would I be a convertite so cold,
As not to tell it. Donne.

CO'NVEX, kŏn'vêks. adj. [convexus, Lat.] Rising in a circular form; opposite to concave.

It is the duty of a painter, even in this also, to imitate the convex mirrour, and to place nothing which glares at the border of his picture. Dryden.

An orb or ball round its own axis whirl;
Will not the motion to a distance hurl
Whatever dust or sand you on its place,
And drops of water from its convex face?
Blackmore on the Creation.

Co'nvex, kŏn'vêks. n. s. A convex body; a body swelling externally into a circular form.

A comet draws a long extended blaze;
From east to west burns thro' th' ethereal frame,
And half heav'n's convex glitters with the flame.
Tickel.

Conve'xed, kŏn-vêkst'.[359] particip. adj. [from convex.] Formed convex; protuberant in a circular form.

Dolphins are straight; nor have they their spine convexed, or more considerably embowed than either sharks, porpoises, whales, or other cetaceous animals. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Conve'xedly, kŏn-vêk'sêd-lê.[364] adv. [from convexed.] In a convex form.

They be drawn convexedly crooked in one piece; yet the dolphin, that carrieth Arion, is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed. Brown.

Conve'xity, kŏn-vêks'ê-tê. n. s. [from convex.] Protuberance in a circular form.

Convex glasses supply the defect of plumpness in the eye, and, by increasing the refraction, make the rays converge sooner, so as to convene distinctly at the bottom of the eye, if the glass have a due degree of convexity. Newton's Opticks.

If the eye were so piercing, as to descry even opake and little objects a hundred leagues off, it would do us little service; it would be terminated by neighbouring hills and woods, or, in the largest and evenest plain, by the very convexity of the earth. Bentley.

Conve'xly, kŏn-vêks'lê. adv. [from convex.] In a convex form.

Almost all, both blunt and sharp, are convexly conical; they are all along convex, not only per ambitum, but between both ends. Grew's Museum.

Conve'xness, kŏn-vêks'nês. n. s. [from convex.] Spheroidical protuberance; convexity.

Convexo-concave, kŏn-vêks'ô-kŏng'- kâve. adj. Having the hollow on the inside corresponding to the external protuberance.

These are the phenomena of thick convexo-concave plates of glass which are every where of the same thickness. Newton.

To CONVE'Y, kôn-vâ'.[269] v. a. [conveho, Lat.]

1. To carry; to transport from one place to another.

Let letters be given me to the governours beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judea. Neh. ii. 7.

I will convey them by sea, in floats, unto the place thou shalt appoint me. 1 Kings, v. 9.

2. To hand from one to another.

A divine natural right could not be conveyed down, without any plain, natural, or divine rule concerning it. Locke.

3. To remove secretly.

There was one conveyed out of my house yesterday in this basket. Shaksp.

4. To bring any thing, as an instrument of transmission; to transmit.

Since there appears not to be any ideas in the mind, before the senses have conveyed any in, I conceive that ideas in the understanding are coeval with sensation. Locke.

5. To transfer; to deliver to another.

The earl of Desmond, before his breaking forth into rebellion, conveyed secretly all his lands to feoffees in trust. Spenser.

Adam's property or private dominion could not convey any sovereignty or rule to his heir, who, not having a right to inherit all his father's possessions, could not thereby come to have any sovereignty over his brethren. Locke.

6. To impart, by means of something.

Men fill one another's heads with noise and sounds, but convey not thereby their thoughts. Locke.

That which uses to produce the idea, though conveyed in by the usual organ, not being taken notice of, there follows no sensation. Locke.

Some single imperceptible bodies must come from them to the eyes; and thereby convey to the brain some motion which produces those ideas. Locke.

They give energy to our expressions, and convey our thoughts in more ardent and intense phrases, than any in our own tongue. Addison's Spectator.

7. To impart; to introduce.

What obscured light the heav'ns did grant,
Did but convey unto our fearful minds
A doubtful warrant of immediate death. Shaksp.

Others convey themselves into the mind by more senses than one. Locke.

8. To manage with privacy.

I will convey the business as I shall find means, and acquaint you withal. Shakspeare.

Hugh Capet also, who usurp'd the crown,
To fine his title with some shews of truth,
Convey'd himself as heir to th' lady Lengare. Shak.

CONVE'YANCE, kôn-vâ'ânse. n. s. [from convey.]

1. The act of removing any thing.

Tell her, thou mad'st away her uncle Clarence,
Her uncle Rivers; ay, and for her sake,
Mad'st quick conveyance with her good aunt Ann. Shakspeare's Richard III.

2. Way for carriage or transportation.

Following the river downward, there is conveyance into the countries named in the text. Raleigh.

Iron works ought to be confined to places where there is no conveyance for timber to places of vent, so as to quit the cost of the carriage. Temple.

3. The method of removing secretly from one place to another.

Your husband's here at hand; bethink you of some conveyance: in the house you cannot hide him. Shakspeare.

4. The means or instrument by which any thing is conveyed.

We powt upon the morning, are unapt
To give or to forgive; but when we've stuff'd
These pipes, and these conveyances of blood,
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls. Shakspeare's Coriolanus.

How such a variety of motions should be regularly conducted, in such a wilderness of passages and distinct avenues, by mere impellents and material conveyances, I have not the least conjecture. Glan. San. Dog.

5. Transmission; delivery from one to another.

Our author has provided for the descending and conveyance down of Adam's monarchical power, or paternal dominion, to posterity. Locke.

6. Act of transferring property; grant.

Doth not the act of the parents, in any lawful grant or conveyance, bind their heirs for ever thereunto? Spenser on Ireland.

7. Writing by which property is transferred.

The very conveyances of his lands will hardly lie in this box; and must the inheritor himself have no more? Shaksp. Hamlet.

This begot a suit in the Chancery before the lord Coventry, who found the conveyances in law to be so firm, that in justice he must decree the land to the earl. Clarendon.

8. Secret management; juggling artifice; private removal; secret substitution of one thing for another.

It cometh herein to pass with men, unadvisedly fallen into error, as with them whose state hath no ground to uphold it, but only the help which, by subtile conveyance, they draw out of casual events, arising from day to day, till at length they be clean spent. Hooker.

Close conveyance, and each practice ill
Of cosinage and knavery. Spenser's Hub. Tale.

I am this day come to survey the Tower;
Since Henry's death, I fear, there is conveyance. Shaksp. Henry VI.

Can they not juggle, and with slight
Conveyance play with wrong and right? Hudibras.

CONVE'YANCER, kôn-vâ'ân-sûr. n. s. [from conveyance.] A lawyer who draws writings by which property is transferred.

CONVE'YER, kôn-vâ'ûr. n. s. [from convey.] One who carries or transmits any thing from one place or person to another.

The conveyers of waters of these times content themselves with one inch of fall in six hundred feet. Brerewood on Languages.

Those who stand before earthly princes, in the nearest degree of approach, who are the dispensers of their favours, and conveyers of their will, to others, do, on that very account, challenge high honours to themselves. Atterbury.

To CONVI'CT, kôn-vîkt'. v. a. [convinco, Lat.]

1. To prove guilty; to detect in guilt.

And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one. John viii. 9.

Things, that at the first shew seemed possible, by ripping up the performance of them, have been convicted of impossibility. Bacon's Holy War.

2. To confute; to discover to be false.

Although not only the reason of any head, but experience of every hand, may well convict it, yet will it not by divers be rejected. Brown.

3. To shew by proof or evidence.

If there be no such thing apparent upon record, they do as if one should demand a legacy by virtue of some written testament, wherein there being no such thing specified, he pleadeth that there it must needs be, and bringeth arguments from the love which always the testator bore him; imagining that these proofs will convict a testament to have that in it, which other men can no where by reading find. Hooker.

CONVI'CT, kôn-vîkt'. adj. [rather the participle of the verb.] Convicted; detected in guilt.

Before I be convict by course of law,
To threaten me with death, is most unlawful. Shaksp. Rich. III.

By the civil law, a person convict, or confessing his own crime, cannot appeal. Ayliffe's Parergon.

Convict a papist he, and I a poet. Pope.

CO'NVICT, kôn'vîkt.[492] n. s. [from the verb.] A person cast at the bar; one found guilty of the crimes charged against him; a criminal detected at his trial.

On the score of humanity, the civil law allows a certain space of time both to the convict and to persons confessing, in order to satisfy the judgment. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONVI'CTION, kôn-vîk'shûn. n. s. [from convict.]

1. Detection of guilt, which is, in law, either when a man is outlawed, or appears and confesses, or else is found guilty by the inquest. Cowell.

The third best absent is condemn'd,
Convict by flight, and rebel to all law;
Conviction to the serpent none belongs. Milton's Par. Lost.

2. The act of convincing; confutation; the act of forcing others, by argument, to allow a position.

When therefore the apostle requireth hability to convict hereticks, can we think he judgeth it a thing unlawful, and not rather needful, to use the principal instrument of their conviction, the light of reason? Hooker.

The manner of his conviction was designed, not as a peculiar privilege to him, but as a standing miracle, a lasting argument for the conviction of others, to the very end of the world. Atterbury.

3. State of being convinced.

Their wisdom is only of this world, to put false colours upon things, to call good evil, and evil good, against the conviction of their own consciences. Swift.

CONVI'CTIVE, kôn-vîk'tîv.[157] adj. [from convict.] Having the power of convincing.

To CONVI'NCE, kôn-vînse'. v. a. [convinco, Lat.]

1. To force any one to acknowledge a contested position.

That which I have all this while been endeavouring to convince men of, and to persuade them to, is no other but what God himself doth particularly recommend to us, as proper for human consideration. Tillotson.

But, having shifted ev'ry form to 'scape,
Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape. Dryd.

History is all the light we have in many cases; and we receive from it a great part of the useful truths we have, with a convincing evidence. Locke.

2. To convict; to prove guilty of.

To convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds. Jude, 15.

The discovery of a truth, formerly unknown, doth rather convince man of ignorance, than nature of errour. Raleigh.

O seek not to convince me of a crime,
Which I can ne'er repent, nor can you pardon. Dryd.

3. To evince; to prove; to manifest; to vindicate. Not in use.

Your Italy contains none so accomplished a courtier, to convince the honour of my mistress. Shaks.

This letter, instead of a confutation, only urgeth me to prove divers passages of my sermon, which M. Cheynel's part was to convince. Dr. Maine.

4. To overpower; to surmount. This sense is now obsolete.

There are a crew of wretched souls
That stay his cure; their malady convinces
The great essay of art. Shaks. Macbeth.

Knaves be such abroad,
Who having, by their own importunate suit,
Or voluntary dotage of some mistress,
Convinc'd or supplied them, they cannot chuse
But they must blab. Shaks. Othello.

When Duncan is asleep, his two chamberlains
Will I with wine and wassel so convince,
That memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume. Shaks. Macbeth.

CONVI'NCEMENT, kŏn-vĭnse'mĕnt. n. s. from convince.] Conviction.

If that be not convincement enough, let him weigh the other also. Decay of Piety.

CONVI'NCIBLE, kŏn-vĭn'sĕ-bl. adj. [from convince.]

1. Capable of conviction.

2. Capable of being evidently disproved or detected.

Upon what uncertainties, and also convincible falsities, they often erected such emblems, we have delivered. Brown.

CONVI'NCINGLY, kŏn-vĭn'sĭng-lē. adv. [from convince.] In such a manner as to leave no room for doubt or dispute; so as to produce conviction.

This he did so particularly and convincingly, that those of the parliament were in great confusion. Clarendon.

The resurrection is so convincingly attested by such persons, with such circumstances, that they who consider and weigh the testimony, at what distance soever they are placed, cannot entertain any more doubt of the resurrection than the crucifixion of Jesus. Atterbury.

CONVI'NCINGNESS, kŏn-vĭn'sĭng-nĕs. n. s. [from convincing.] The power of convincing.

To CONVI'VE, kŏn-vīve'. v. a. [convivo, Lat.] To entertain; to feast. A word, I believe, not elsewhere used.

First, all you peers of Greece, go to my tent.
There in the full convive you. Shaksp.

CONVI'VAL, kŏn-vī'văl.[113] } adj. [convi-
CONVI'VIAL, kŏn-vĭv'yăl. } vialis, Lat.] Relating to an entertainment; festal; social.

I was the first who set up festivals;
Not with high tastes our appetites did force,
But fill'd with conversation and discourse;
Which feasts, convivial meetings we did name.
Denham.

Your social and convivial spirit is such, that it is a happiness to live and converse with you. Dr. Newton.

CONU'NDRUM, kŏ-nŭn'drŭm. n. s. A low jest; a quibble; a mean conceit: a cant word.

Mean time he smoaks, and laughs at merry tale,
Or pun ambiguous, or conundrum quaint. Philips.

To CO'NVOCATE, kŏn'vŏ-kāte. v. a. [convoco, Lat.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

CONVOCA'TION, kŏn-vŏ-kā'shŭn. n. s. [convocatio, Lat.]

1. The act of calling to an assembly.

Diaphantus, making a general convocation, spake to them in this manner. Sidney.

2. An assembly.

On the eighth day shall be an holy convocation unto you. Lev. xxiii. 20.

3. An assembly of the clergy for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical, in time of parliament: and, as the parliament consists of two distinct houses, so does this; the one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies. Cowell.

I have made an offer to his majesty,
Upon our spiritual convocation,
As touching France, to give a greater sum
Than ever at one time the clergy yet
Did to his predecessors part withal. Shaksp.

This is the declaration of our church about it, made by those who met in convocation. Stillingfleet.

To CONVO'KE, kŏn-vōke'. v. a. [convoco, Lat.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

Assemblies exercise their legislature at the times that their constitution, or their own adjournment, appoints, if there be no other way prescribed to convoke them. Locke.

When next the morning warms the purple east,
Convoke the peerage. Pope.

The senate originally consisted all of nobles, the people being only convoked upon such occasions as fell into their cognizance. Swift.

To CONVO'LVE, kŏn-vŏlv'. v. a. [convolvo, Lat.] To roll together; to roll one part upon another.

He writh'd him to and fro convolv'd. Milton.

It is a wonderful artifice how newly hatched maggots, not the parent animal, because she emits no web, nor hath any textrine art, can convolve the stubborn leaf, and bind it with the thread it weaves from its body. Derham.

Us'd to milder scents, the tender race
By thousands tumble from their honey'd domes,
Convolv'd and agonizing in the dust. Thomson.

CO'NVOLUTED, kŏn-vŏ-lū'tĕd. part. [of the verb I have found no example.] Twisted; rolled upon itself.

This differs from Muscovy-glass only in this, that the plates of that are flat and plain, whereas these are convoluted and inflected. Woodward.

CONVOLU'TION, kŏn-vŏ-lū'shŭn. n. s. [convolutio, Lat.]

1. The act of rolling any thing upon itself; the state of being rolled upon itself.

Observe the convolution of the said fibres in all other glands, in the same or some other manner. Grew.

A thousand secret, subtle pipes bestow,
From which, by num'rous convolutions wound,
Wrapp'd with th' attending nerve, and twisted round. Blackmore.

2. The state of rolling together in company.

And toss'd wide round,
O'er the calm sea, in convolution swift
The feather'd eddy floats. Thomson.

To CONVO'Y, kŏn-vŏe'. v. a. [convoyer, Fr. from conviare, low Lat.] To accompany by land or sea, for the sake of defence: as, he was convoyed by ships of war.

CO'NVOY, kŏn'vŏe.[492] n. s. [from the verb. Anciently the accent was on the last syllable; it is now on the first.]

1. Force attending on the road by way of defence.

Had not God set peculiar value upon his temple, he would not have made himself his people's convoy to secure them in their passage to it. South.

My soul grows hard, and cannot death endure;
Your convoy makes the dangerous way secure.
Dryden.

Convoy ships accompany their merchants, till they may prosecute the voyage without danger. Dryden.

2. The act of attending as a defence.

Such fellows will learn you by rote where services were done; at such a breach, at such a convoy. Shaksp. Henry V.

Swift, as a sparkle of a glancing star,
I shoot from heav'n to give him safe convoy. Milt.

3. Conveyance. Not now in use.

Sister, as the winds give benefit,
And convoy is assistant, do not sleep,
But let me hear from you. Shaksp.

CO'NUSANCE, kŏn'ū-sânse. n. s. [conoissance, Fr.] Cognizance; notice; knowledge. A law term.

To CONVU'LSE, kŏn-vŭlse'. v. a. [convulsus, Lat.] To give an irregular and involuntary motion to the parts of any body.

Follows the loosen'd, aggravated roar,
Enlarging, deepening, mingling peal on peal,
Crush'd horrible, convulsing heaven and earth.
Thomson.

CONVU'LSION, kŏn-vŭl'shŭn. n. s. [convulsio, Lat.]

1. A convulsion is an involuntary contraction of the fibres and muscles, whereby the body and limbs are preternaturally distorted. Quincy.

If my hand be put into motion by a convulsion, the indifferency of that operative faculty is taken away. Locke.

2. Any irregular and violent motion; tumult; commotion; disturbance.

All have been subject to some concussions, and fall under the same convulsions of state, by dissensions or invasions. Temple.

CONVU'LSIVE, kŏn-vŭl'sĭv.[158 428] adj. [convulsif, Fr.] That which produces involuntary motion; that which gives twitches or spasms.

They are irregular and convulsive motions, or strugglings of the spirits. Hale.

Shew me the flying soul's convulsive strife,
And all the anguish of departing life. Dryden.

Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
And hollow groans from her deep spirit came;
Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her lab'ring breast.
Dryden.

In silence weep,
And thy convulsive sorrows inward keep. Prior.

CO'NY, kŭn'nē. n. s. [kanin, Germ. connil or connin, Fr. cuniculus, Lat.] A rabbit; an animal that burroughs in the ground.

With a short-legg'd hen,
Lemons and wine for sauce; to these a cony
Is not to be despair'd of, for our money. Ben Jons.

The husbandman suffers by hares and conys, which eat the corn and trees. Mortimer's Husb.

CO'NY-BOROUGH, kŭn'nē-bŭr-ō. n. s. A place where rabbits make their holes in the ground.

To CO'NYCATCH, kŭn'nē-kătsh. v. n. To catch a cony, is, in the old cant of thieves, to cheat; to bite; to trick.

I have matter in my head against you, and against your conycatching rascals. Shakspeare.

CO'NYCATCHER, kŭn'nē-kătsh-ŭr. n. s. A thief; a cheat; a sharper; a tricking fellow; a rascal. Now obsolete.

To COO, kōō.[10] v. n. [from the sound.] To cry as a dove or pigeon.

The stockdove only through the forest cooes,
Mournfully hoarse. Thomson.

COOK, kȯȯk.[306] n. s. [coquus, Lat.] One whose profession is to dress and prepare victuals for the table.

One mistress Quickly is in the manner of his nurse, or his dry-nurse, or his cook, or his laundry, his washer, and his wringer. Shakspeare.

The new-born babe by nurses overlaid,
And the cook caught within the raging fire he made. Dryden.

Their cooks could make artificial birds and fishes, in default of the real ones, and which exceeded them in the exquisiteness of the taste. Arbuthnot on Coins.

Cook-maid, kȯȯk'mȧde. n. s. [cook and maid.] A maid that dresses provisions.

A friend was complaining to me, that his wife had turned off one of the best cook-maids in England. Addison.

Cook-room, kȯȯk'rȯȯm. n. s. [cook and room.] A room in which provisions are prepared for the ship's crew. The kitchen of a ship.

The commodity of this new cook-room the merchants having found to be so great, as that in all their ships the cook-rooms are built in their forecastles, contrary to that which had been anciently used. Raleigh.

To Cook, kȯȯk. v. a. [coquo, Lat.]

1. To prepare victuals for the table.

Had either of the crimes been cooked to their palates, they might have changed messes. Decay of Piety.

2. To prepare for any purpose.

Hanging is the word, Sir; if you be ready for that, you are well cookt. Shakspeare.

Coo'kery, kȯȯk'ůr-rė.[555] n. s. [from cook.] The art of dressing victuals.

Some man's wit
Found th' art of cook'ry to delight his sense:
More bodies are consum'd and kill'd with it,
Than with the sword, famine, or pestilence. Davies.

Ev'ry one to cookery pretends. King's Cookery.

These are the ingredients of plants before they are prepared by cookery. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

COOL, kȯȯl.[306] adj. [koelen, Dut.]

1. Somewhat cold; approaching to cold.

He set his leg in a pail-full, as hot as he could well endure it, renewing it as it grew cool. Temple.

2. Not zealous; not ardent; not angry; not fond; without passion: as, a cool friend, a cool deceiver.

Cool, kȯȯl. n. s. Freedom from heat; soft and refreshing coldness.

But see where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon-day breeze. Addison.

Philander was enjoying the cool of the morning, among the dews that lay on every thing about him, and that gave the air a freshness. Addison.

T Cool, kȯȯl. v. a. [koelen, Dut.]

1. To make cool; to allay heat.

Snow they use in Naples instead of ice, because as they say, it cools or congeals any liquor sooner. Addison on Italy.

Jelly of currants, or the jelly of any ripe subacid fruit, is cooling, and very agreeable to the stomach. Arbuthnot.

2. To quiet passion; to calm anger; to moderate zeal.

My lord Northumberland will soon be cool'd. Shaksp. Henry IV.

He will keep his jealousy to himself, and repine in private, because he will be apt to fear some ill effect it may produce in cooling your love to him. Addison's Spect.

Had they thought they had been fighting only other people's quarrels, perhaps it might have cooled their zeal. Swift.

To Cool, kȯȯl. v. n.

1. To grow less hot.

2. To grow less warm with regard to passion or inclination.

My humour shall not cool; I will incense Ford to deal with poison; I will possess him with yellowness. Shaksp.

You never cool while you read Homer. Dryden.

I'm impatient till it be done; I will not give myself liberty to think, lest I should cool. Congreve.

Co'oler, kȯȯl'ůr. n. s. [from cool.]

1. That which has the power of cooling the body.

Coolers are of two sorts; first, those which produce an immediate sense of cold, which are such as have their parts in less motion than those of the organs of feeling; and secondly, such as, by particular viscidity, or grossness of parts, give a greater consistence to the animal fluids than they had before, whereby they cannot move so fast, and therefore will have less of that intestine force on which their heat depends. The former are fruits, all acid liquors, and common water; and the latter are such as cucumbers, and all substances producing viscidity. Quincy.

In dogs or cats there appeared the same necessity for a cooler as in man. Harvey on Consumptions.

Acid things were used only as coolers. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A vessel in which any thing is made cool.

Your first wort being thus boiled, lade off into one or more coolers, or cool-backs, in which leave the fullage behind, and let it run off fine. Mortimer's Husbandry.

Co'olly, kȯȯl'lė. adv. [from cool.]

1. Without heat, or sharp cold.

She in the gelid caverns, woodbine wrought,
And fresh bedew'd with ever-spouting streams,
Sits coolly calm. Thomson's Summer.

2. Without passion.

Motives that address themselves coolly to our reason, are fittest to be employed upon reasonable creatures. Atterbury.

Co'olness, kȯȯl'nės. n. s. [from cool.]

1. Gentle cold; a soft or mild degree of cold.

This difference consisteth not in the heat or coolness of spirits; for cloves and other spices, naptha, and petroleum, have exceeding hot spirits, hotter a great deal than oil, wax, or tallow, but not inflamed. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

The toad loveth shade and coolness. Bacon.

Yonder the harvest of cold months laid up,
Gives a fresh coolness to the royal cup;
There ice, like crystal, firm and never lost,
Tempers hot July with December's frost. Waller.

The sheep enjoy the coolness of the shade. Dryden's Virgil.

2. Want of affection; disinclination.

They parted with such coolness towards each other, as if they scarce hoped to meet again. Clarendon.

3. Freedom from passion.

Coom, kȯȯm.[306] n. s. [ecume, Fr.]

1. Soot that gathers over an oven's mouth. Phillips.

2. That matter that works out of the wheels of carriages. Bailey.

3. It is used in Scotland for the useless dust which falls from large coals.

Coomb, or Comb, kȯȯm. n. s. [comble, Fr. cumulus, Lat. a heap, Skinner.] A measure of corn containing four bushels. Bailey.

COOP, kȯȯp. n. s. [kuype, Dut.]

1. A barrel; a vessel for the preservation of liquids.

2. A cage; a penn for animals, as poultry or sheep.

Gracchus was slain the day the chickens refused to eat out of the coop; and Claudius Pulcher underwent the like success, when he contemned the tripudiary augurations. Brown.

There were a great many crammed capons together in a coop. L'Estrange.

To Coop, kȯȯp. v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up in a narrow compass; to confine; to cage; to imprison: when it is used absolutely, it has often, perhaps always, the intensive particle up.

That pale, that white-fac'd shore,
Whose foot spurns back the ocean's roaring tides,
And coops from other lands her islanders. Shaksp.

The Englishmen did coop up the lord Ravenstein, that he stirred not; and likewise held in strait siege the town. Bacon.

In the taking of a town the poor escape better than the rich; for the one is let go, and the other is plundered and cooped up. L'Estrange.

Twice conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown,
Coop'd up a second time within your town!
Who dare not issue forth in open field. Dryden.

One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind;
Coop'd up he seem'd, in earth and seas confin'd. Dryden's Juvenal.

Coop'd up in a narrow isle, observing dreams
With flattering wizards. Dryden's Juvenal.

The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,
Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng. Dryden.

The contempt of all other knowledge, as if it were nothing in comparison of law or physick, of astrology or chymistry, coops the understanding up within narrow bounds, and hinders it from looking abroad into other provinces of the intellectual world. Locke.

They are cooped in close by the laws of their countries, and the strict guards of those whose interest it is to keep them ignorant. Locke.

What! coop whole armies in our walls again! Pope.

Coope'e, kȯȯ-pė'. n. s. [coupé, Fr.] A motion in dancing.

Co'oper, kȯȯ'půr.[98] n. s. [from coop.] One that makes coops or barrels.

Societies of artificers and tradesmen, belonging to some towns corporate, such as weavers and coopers, by virtue of their charters, pretend to privilege and jurisdiction. Child.

Co'operage, kȯȯ'půr-ĭdje.[90] n. s. [from cooper.] The price paid for cooper's work.

To COO'PERATE, kȯ-ȯp'ėr-ȧte. v. n. [con and opera, Lat.]

1. To labour jointly with another to the same end: it has with before the agent, and to before the end.

It puzzleth and perplexeth the conceits of many, that perhaps would otherwise cooperate with him, and makes a man walk almost alone to his own ends. Bacon.

By giving man a free will, he allows man that highest satisfaction and privilege of cooperating to his own felicity. Boyle.

2. To concur in producing the same effect.

His mercy will not forgive offenders, or his benignity cooperate to their conversions. Brown.

All these causes cooperating, must, at last, weaken their motion. Cheyne's Philosoph. Principles.

The special acts and impressions by which the Divine Spirit introduces this change, and how far human liberty cooperates with it, are subjects beyond our comprehension. Rogers.

Coopera'tion, kȯ-ȯp-ėr-ȧ'shůn. n. s. [from cooperate.] The act of contributing or concurring to the same end.

We might work any effect without and against matter; and this not holpen by the cooperation of angels or spirits, but only by the unity and harmony of nature. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

Coo'PERATIVE, kŏ-ŏp'ĕr-ā-tĭv. adj. [from cooperate.] Promoting the same end jointly.

Coopera'TOR, kŏ-ŏp'ĕr-ā-tŭr. n. s. [from cooperate.] He that by joint endeavours, promotes the same end with others.

Coopta'TION, kŏ-ŏp-tā'shŭn. n. s. [coopto, Lat.] Adoption; assumption.

COO'RDINATE, kŏ-ŏr'dē-nāte.[91] adj. [con and ordinatus, Lat.] Holding the same rank; not being subordinate. Thus shell-fish may be divided into two coordinate kinds, crustaceous and testaceous; each of which is again divided into many species, subordinate to the kind, but coordinate to each other.

The word Analysis signifies the general and particular heads of a discourse, with their mutual connexions, both coordinate and subordinate, drawn out into one or more tables. Watts.

Coo'RDINATELY, kŏ-ŏr'dē-nāte-lē. adv. [from coordinate.] In the same rank; in the same relation; without subordination.

Coo'RDINATENESS, kŏ-ŏr'dē-nāte-nĕs. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of being coordinate.

Coo'RDINATION, kŏ-ŏr-dē-nā'shŭn. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of holding the same rank; of standing in the same relation to something higher; collateralness.

In this high court of parliament there is a rare coordination of power, a wholesome mixture betwixt monarchy, optimacy, and democracy. Howel's Pre-eminence of Parliament.

When these petty intrigues of a play are so ill ordered, that they have no coherence with the other, I must grant that Lysidius has reason to tax that want of due connexion; for coordination in a play is as dangerous and unnatural as in a state. Dryden.

Coot, kōōt.[306] n. s. [maer-koet, Dut. cotée, Fr.] A small black water-fowl, seen often in fens and marshes.

A lake, the haunt
Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant. Dryden.

COP, kŏp. n. s. [kop, Dut. cop, Sax.] The head; the top of any thing; any thing rising to a head: as, a cop, vulgarly cock of hay; a cob-castle, properly cop-castle, a small castle or house on a hill; a cob of cherry-stones, for cop, a pile of stones one laid upon another; a tuft on the head of birds.

Co'PAL, kō'pāl. n. s. The Mexican term for a gum.

Copa'RCENARY, kŏ-pār'sē-nā-rē. n. s. [from coparcener.] Joint succession to any inheritance.

In descent to all the daughters in coparcenary, for want of sons, the chief house is allotted to the eldest daughter. Hale

COPA'RCENER, kŏ-pār'sē-nŭr. n. s. [from con and particeps, Lat.]

Coparceners are otherwise called parceners; and, in common law, are such as have equal portion in the inheritance of the ancestor. Cowell.

This great lordship was broken and divided, and partition made between the five daughters: in every of these portions, the coparceners severally exercised the same jurisdiction royal, which the earl marshal and his sons had used in the whole province. Davies.

Copa'RCENY, kŏ-pār'sē-nē. n. s. An equal share of coparceners. Phillip's World of Words.

COPA'RTNER, kŏ-pārt'nŭr.[98] n. s. [co and partner.] One that has a share in some common stock or affair; one equally concerned; a sharer; a partaker; a partner. Milton has used it both with of and in.

Our faithful friends,
The associates and copartners of our loss. Milton.

Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake
Full happiness with me? Or rather not;
But keep the odds of knowledge in my pow'r,
Without copartner? Milton's Paradise Lost.

Rather by them
I gain'd what I have gain'd, and with them dwell
Copartner in these regions of the world. Milton.

Copa'RTNERSHIP, kŏ-pārt'nŭr-shĭp. n. s. [from copartner.] The state of bearing an equal part, or possessing an equal share.

In case the father left only daughters, the daughters equally succeeded to their father as in copartnership. Hale.

Co'PATAIN, kŏp'ā-tĭn.[208] adj. [from cop.] High raised; pointed. Hanmer.

Oh, fine villain! a silken doublet, a velvet hose, a scarlet cloke, and a copatain hat. Shakspeare.

Copa'YVA, kŏ-pā'vā. n. s. [It is sometimes written capivi, copivi, cupayva, copayva, cupayva, cupayba.] A gum which distils from a tree in Brasil. It is much used in disorders of the urinary passages.

Cope, kōpe. n. s. [See Cop.]

1. Any thing with which the head is covered.
2. A sacerdotal cloak, or vestment worn in sacred ministration.
3. Any thing which is spread over the head, as the concave of the skies: any archwork over a door.

All these things that are contained
Within this goodly cope, both most and least,
Their being have, and daily are increast. Spenser.

Over head the dismal hiss
Of fiery darts in flaming volleys flew,
And flying vaulted either host with fire;
So, under fiery cope, together rush'd
Both battles main. Milton's Par. Lost.

The scholar believes there is no man under the cope of heaven, who is so knowing as his master. Dryden.

To Cope, kōpe. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover, as with a cope.

A very large bridge, that is all made of wood, and coped over head. Addison on Italy.

2. To contend with; to oppose.

Know my name is lost,
By treason's tooth bare gnawn, and canker-bit;
Yet am I noble as the adversary
I come to cope. Shakspeare.

3. To reward; to give in return.

I and my friend
Have, by your wisdom, been this day acquitted
Of grievous penalties; in lieu whereof,
Three thousand ducats, due unto the Jew,
We freely cope your courteous pains withal. Shaksp.

To Cope, kōpe. v. n.

1. To contend; to struggle; to strive. It has with before the thing or person opposed. [In this sense it is a word of doubtful etymology. The conjecture of Junius derives it from koopen to buy, or some other word of the same import; so that to cope with signifies to interchange blows, or any thing else, with another.]

Let our trains
March by us, that we may peruse the men
We should have cop'd withal. Shakspeare.

It is likely thou wilt undertake
A thing, like death, to chide away this shame,
That copes with death itself, to 'scape from it. Shak.

But Eve was Eve;
This far his over-match, who, self-deceiv'd,
And rash, beforehand had no better weigh'd
The strength he was to cope with, or his own. Milton.

They perfectly understood both the hares and the enemy they were to cope withal. L'Estrange.

On every plain,
Host cop'd with host, dire was the din of war.
Philips.

Their generals have not been able to cope with the troops of Athens, which I have conducted. Addison.

If the mind apply itself first to easier subjects, and things near a-kin to what is already known; and then advance to the more remote and knotty parts of knowledge by slow degrees, it will be able, in this manner, to cope with great difficulties, and prevail over them with amazing and happy success. Watts.

2. To encounter; to interchange kindness or sentiments.

Thou fresh piece
Of excellent witchcraft, who of force must know
The royal fool thou cop'st with. Shakspeare.

Thou art e'en as just a man,
As e'er my conversation cop'd withal. Shakspeare.

To Cope, kōpe. v. a. To embrace. Not in use.

I will make him tell the tale anew;
Where, how, how oft, how long ago, and when,
He hath, and is again to cope your wife. Shakspeare.

Co'PESMATE, kōpes'māte. n. s. [perhaps for cutsmate, a companion in drinking, or one that dwells under the same cope, for house.] Companion; friend. An old word.

Ne ever staid in place, ne spake to wight,
Till that the fox his copesmate he had found.
Hubberd's Tale.

Co'PIER, kŏp'pē-ŭr. n. s. [from copy.]

1. One that copies; a transcriber.

A coin is in no danger of having its characters altered by copiers and transcribers. Addison.

2. One that imitates; a plagiary; an imitator.

Without invention a painter is but a copier, and a poet but a plagiary of others. Dryden.

Let the faint copier, on old Tiber's shore,
Nor mean the task, each breathing bust explore;
Line after line with painful patience trace,
This Roman grandeur, that Athenian grace. Tickel.

Co'PING, kō'pĭng. n. s. [from cope.] The upper tire of masonry which covers the wall.

All these were of costly stones, even from the foundation unto the coping. 1 Kings, vii. 9.

The coping, the modillions, or dentils, make a noble shew by their graceful projections. Addison.

CO'PIOUS, kō'pē-ŭs. adj. [copia, Lat.]

1. Plentiful; abundant; exuberant; in great quantities.

Rose, as in dance, the stately trees, and spread
Their branches hung with copious fruit. Milton.

Full measure only bounds
Excess, before the all-bounteous king, who show'r'd
With copious hand, rejoicing in their joy. Milton.

This alkaline acrimony indicates the copious use of vinegar and acid fruits. Arbuthnot.

The tender heart is peace,

And kindly pours its copious treasures forth
In various converse. Thomson.

2. Abounding in words or images; not barren; not confined; not concise.

Hail, Son of God, Saviour of men! thy name
Shall be the copious matter of my song
Henceforth, and never shall my harp thy praise
Forget, nor from thy Father's praise disjoin. Milton.

Co'piously, kō'pē-ŭs-lē. adv. [from copious.]

1. Plentifully; abundantly; in great quantities.

2. At large; without brevity or conciseness; diffusely.

These several remains have been so copiously described by abundance of travellers, and other writers, that it is very difficult to make any new discoveries on so beaten a subject. Addison.

Co'piousness, kō'pē-ŭs-nĕs. n. s. [from copious.]

1. Plenty; abundance; great quantity; exuberance.

2. Diffusion; exuberance of style.

The Roman orator endeavoured to imitate the copiousness of Homer, and the Latin poet made it his business to reach the conciseness of Demosthenes. Dryden.

Co'pist, kŏ'pĭst. n. s. [from copy.] A copier; a transcriber; an imitator.

Co'pland, kŏp'lănd. n. s. A piece of ground in which the land terminates with an acute angle. Dict.

Co'pped, kŏp'pĕd or kŏpt.[366] adj. [from cop.] Rising to a top or head.

It was broad in its basis, and rose copped like a sugar-loaf. Wiseman's Surgery.

A galeated eschinus being copped and somewhat conic. Woodward.

Co'ppel, kŏp'pĕl. n. s. [This word is variously spelt; as copel, cupel, cuple, and cupple; but I cannot find its etymology.] An instrument used in chymistry, in the form of a dish, made of ashes, well washed, to cleanse them from all their salt; or of bones thoroughly calcined. Its use is to try and purify gold and silver, which is done by mingling lead with the metal, and exposing it in the coppel to a violent fire a long while. The impurities of the metal will then be carried off in dross, which is called the litharge of gold and silver. The refiners call the coppel a test. Harris.

CO'PPER, kŏp'pŭr.[98] n. s. [koper, Dutch, cuprum, Lat.] One of the six primitive metals.

Copper is the most ductile and malleable metal, after gold and silver. Of a mixture of copper and lapis calaminaris is formed brass; a composition of copper and tin makes bell-metal; and copper and brass, melted in equal quantities, produce what the French call bronze, used for figures and statues. Chambers.

Copper is heavier than iron or tin; but lighter than silver, lead, and gold. Hill on Fossils.

Two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold. Ezra, viii. 27.

Co'pper, kŏp'pŭr. n. s. A vessel made of copper: commonly used for a boiler larger than a moveable pot.

They boiled it in a copper to the half; then they poured it into earthen vessels. Bacon.

Co'pper-nose, kŏp'pŭr-nōse. n. s. [copper and nose.] A red nose.

He having colour enough, and the other higher, is too flaming a praise for a good complexion: I had as lieve Helen's golden tongue had commended Troilus for a copper-nose. Shakspeare.

Gutta rosacea ariseth in little hard tubercles, affecting the face all over with great itching, which being scratched, looks red, and rises in great welks, rendering the visage fiery; and makes copper-noses, as we generally express them. Wiseman.

Copper-plate, kŏp-pŭr-plāte'. n. s. A plate on which pictures are engraven for the neater impression, distinguished from a wooden cut.

Copper-work, kŏp'pŭr-wŭrk, n. s. [copper and work.] A place where copper is worked or manufactured.

Co'pperas, kŏp'pŭr-ăs. n. s. [kopperoose, Dutch, couperouse, French; supposed to be found in copper mines only.] A name given to three sorts of vitriol; the green, the bluish green, and the white, which are produced in the mines of Germany, Hungary, and other countries. But what is commonly sold here for copperas, is an artificial vitriol, made of a kind of stones found on the sea-shore in Essex, Hampshire, and so westward, ordinarily called gold stones from their colour. They abound with iron, and are exposed to the weather in beds above ground, and receive the rains and dews, which in time breaks and dissolves the stones: the liquor that runs off is pumped into boilers, in which is first put old iron, which, in boiling, dissolves. This factitious copperas, in many respects, agrees with the native green vitriol. Chambers. Hill.

It may be questioned, whether, in this operation, the iron or copperas be transmuted, from the cognation of copperas with copper, and the iron remaining after conversion. Brown.

Co'ppersmith, kŏp'pŭr-smĭth. n. s. [copper and smith.] One that manufactures copper.

Salmoneus, as the Grecian tale is,
Was a mad coppersmith of Elis;
Up at his forge by morning peep. Swift.

Co'pperworm, kŏp'pŭr-wŭrm. n. s. [teredo, Lat.]

1. A little worm in ships.

2. A worm that fretteth garments.

3. A worm breeding in one's hand. Ainsworth.

Co'ppery, kŏp'pŭr-ē. adj. [from copper.] Containing copper; made of copper.

Some springs of Hungary, highly impregnated with vitriolick salts, dissolve the body of iron put into the spring, and deposite, in lieu of the irony particles carried off, coppery particles brought with the water out of the neighbouring copper-mines. Woodward on Fossils.

CO'PPICE, kŏp'pĭs.[142] n. s. [coupeaux, Fr. from couper, to cut or lop. It is often written copse.] Low woods cut at stated times for fuel; a place over-run with brush-wood.

A land, each side whereof was bounded both with high timber trees, and copses of far more humble growth. Sidney.

Upon the edge of yonder coppice,
A stand, where you may have the fairest shoot. Shakspeare.

In coppice woods, if you leave staddles too thick, they run to bushes and briars, and have little clean underwood. Bacon.

The willows, and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen
Fanning their joyous leaves to their soft lays. Milton.

Raise trees in your seminaries and nurseries, and you may transplant them for coppice ground, walks, or hedges. Mortimer's Husbandry.

The rate of coppice lands will fall upon the discovery of coal-mines. Locke.

Co'pple-dust, kŏp'pl-dŭst. n. s. [probably for coppel, or cupel dust.] Powder used in purifying metals, or the gross parts separated by the cupel.

It may be also tried by incorporating powder of steel, or copple-dust, by pouncing into the quicksilver. Bacon.

Copple-stones, kŏp'pl-stōnes, are lumps and fragments of stone or marble, broke from the adjacent cliffs, rounded by being bowled and tumbled to and again by the action of the water. Woodward.

Co'ppled, kŏp'pld.[359] adj. [from cop.] Rising in a conick form; rising to a point.

There is some difference in this shape, some being flatter on the top, others more coppled. Woodward on Fossils.

Copse, kŏps. n. s. [abbreviated from coppice.] Short wood cut at a certain growth for fuel; a place overgrown with short wood.

The east quarters of the shire are not destitute of copse woods. Carew.

Oaks and brambles, if the copse be burn'd,
Confounded lie, to the same ashes turn'd. Waller.

But in what quarter of the copse it lay,
His eye by certain level could survey. Dryden.

To Copse, kŏps. v. a. [from the noun.] To preserve underwoods.

The neglect of copsing wood cut down, hath been of very evil consequence. Swift.

CO'PULA, kŏp'ù-lă. n. s. [Lat.] The word which unites the subject and predicate of a proposition; as, books are dear.

The copula is the form of a proposition; it represents the act of the mind, affirming or denying. Watts's Logick.

To CO'PULATE, kŏp'ù-lāte. v. a. [copulo, Lat.] To unite; to conjoin; to link together.

If the force of custom, simple and separate, be great, the force of custom copulate, and conjoined, and collegiate, is far greater. Bacon.

To Co'pulate, kŏp'ù-lāte. v. n. To come together as different sexes.

Not only the persons so copulating are infected, but also their children. Wiseman's Surgery.

Copula'tion, kŏp-ù-lā'shŭn. n. s. [from copulate.] The congress or embrace of the two sexes.

Sundry kinds, even of conjugal copulation, are prohibited as unhonest. Hooker.

Co'pulative, kŏp'ù-lā-tĭv.[157] adj. [copulativus, Lat.] A term of grammar.

Copulative propositions are those which have more subjects or predicates connected by affirmative or negative conjunctions: as, riches and honours are temptations to pride; Cæsar conquered the Gauls and the Britons; neither gold nor jewels will purchase immortality. Watts.

CO'PY, kŏp'pē.[482] n. s. [copie, Fr. copia, low Lat. quod cuipiam facta est copia exscribendi. Junius inclines, after his manner, to derive it from κοπος, labour; because, says he, to copy another's writing is very painful and laborious.]

1. A transcript from the archetype or original.

If virtue's self were lost, we might
From your fair mind new copies write. Waller.

I have not the vanity to think my copy equal to the original. Denham.

He stept forth, not only the copy of God's hands, but also the copy of his perfections, a kind of image or representation of the Deity in small. South.

The Romans having sent to Athens, and the Greek cities of Italy, for copies of the best laws, chose ten legislators to put them into form. Swift.

2. An individual book; one of many books: as, a good or fair copy.

The very having of the books of God was a matter of no small charge, as they could not be had otherwise than in written copies. Hooker.

3. The autograph; the original; the archetype; that from which any thing is copied.

It was the copy of our conference;
In bed he slept not, for my urging it;
At board he fed not, for my urging it. Shaksp.

Let him first learn to write, after a copy, all the letters in the vulgar alphabet. Holder.

The first of them I have forgotten, and cannot easily retrieve, because the copy is at the press. Dryden.

4. An instrument by which any conveyance is made in law.

Thou know'st that Banquo and his Fleance lives;
But in them nature's copy's not eternal. Shaksp.

5. A picture drawn from another picture.

COPY-BOOK, kŏp'pė-bo͝ok. n. s. [copy and book.] A book in which copies are written for learners to imitate.

COPY-HOLD, kŏp'pė-hōld. n. s. [copy and hold.] A tenure, for which the tenant hath nothing to shew but the copy of the rolls made by the steward of his lord's court; for the steward, as he enrolls other things done in the lord's court, so he registers such tenants as are admitted in the court, to any parcel of land or tenement belonging to the manor; and the transcript of this is called the court roll, the copy of which the tenant takes from him, and keeps as his only evidence. This is called a base tenure, because it holds at the will of the lord; yet not simply, but according to the custom of the manor; so that if a copy-holder break not the custom of the manor, and thereby forfeit his tenure, he cannot be turned out at the lord's pleasure. These customs of manors vary, in one point or other, almost in every manor. Some copy-holds are finable, and some certain: that which is finable, the lord rates at what fine or income he pleases, when the tenant is admitted into it; that which is certain, is a kind of inheritance, and called in many places customary; because the tenant dying, and the hold being void, the next of blood paying the customary fine, as two shillings for an acre, or so, cannot be denied his admission. Some copy-holders have, by custom, the wood growing upon their own land, which by law they could not have. Some hold by the verge in ancient demesne; and though they hold by copy, yet are they, in account, a kind of freeholder; for, if such a one commit felony, the king hath annum, diem, and vastum, as in case of freehold. Some others hold by common tenure, called mere copy-hold; and, they committing felony, their land escheats to the lord of the manor. Cowell.

If a customary tenant die, the widow shall have what the law calls her free bench in all his copy-hold lands. Addison.

COPY-HOLDER, kŏp'pė-hōl-dûr. n. s. [from copyhold.] One that is possessed of land in copyhold.

To CO'PY, kŏp'pė. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To transcribe; to write after an original: it has sometimes out, a kind of pleonasm.

He who hurts a harmless neighbour's peace,
Who loves a lye, lame slander helps about,
Who writes a libel, or who copies out. Pope's Epist.

2. To imitate; to propose to imitation; to endeavour to resemble.

He that borrows other men's experience, with this design of copying it out, possesses himself of one of the greatest advantages. Decay of Piety.

Set the examples, and their souls inflame
To copy out their great forefathers' fame. Dryden.

To copy her few nymphs aspir'd,
Her virtues fewer swains admir'd. Swift.

To CO'PY, kŏp'pė. v. n.

1 To do any hing in imitation of something else.

Some imagine, that whatsoever they find in the picture of a master, who has acquired reputation, must of necessity be excellent; and never fail, when they copy, to follow the bad as well as the good things. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

2. It has sometimes from before the thing imitated.

When a painter copies from the life, he has no privilege to alter features and lineaments, under pretence that his picture will look better. Dryden.

3. Sometimes after.

Several of our countrymen, and Mr. Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their dramatick writings, and in their poems upon love. Addison's Spectator.

To COQUE'T, kō-kĕt'.[415] v. a. [from the noun.] To entertain with compliments and amorous tattle; to treat with an appearance of amorous tenderness.

You are coquetting a maid of honour, my lord looking on to see how the gamesters play, and I railing at you both. Swift.

To COQUE'T, kō-kĕt'. v. n. To act the lover; to entice by blandishments.

Phyllis, who but a month ago
Was married to the Tunbridge beau,
I saw coquetting t' other night,
In publick, with that odious knight. Swift.

COQUE'TRY, kō-kĕt'rė. n. s. [coqueterie, Fr.] Affectation of amorous advances; desire of attracting notice.

I was often in company with a couple of charming women, who had all the wit and beauty one could desire in female companions, without a dash of coquetry, that from time to time gave me a great many agreeable torments. Addison's Spectator.

COQUE'TTE, kō-kĕt'. n. s. [coquette, Fr. from coquart, a prattler.] A gay, airy girl; a girl who endeavours to attract notice.

The light coquettes in sylphs aloft repair,
And sport and flutter in the fields of air. Pope.

A coquette and a tinder-box are sparkled. Arbuthnot and Pope.

CO'RACLE, kŏr'ă-kl. n. s. [cwrwgle, Welsh, probably from corium, leather, Lat.] A boat used in Wales by fishers, made by drawing leather or oiled cloth upon a frame of wicker work.

CO'RAL, kŏr'ăl. n. s. [corallium, Lat.]

1. Red coral is a plant of as great hardness and stony nature, while growing in the water, as it has after long exposure to the air. The vulgar opinion, that coral is soft while in the sea, proceeds from a soft and thin coat, of a crustaceous matter, covering it while it is growing, and which is taken off before it is packed up for use. The whole coral plant grows to a foot or more in height, and is variously ramified. It is thickest at the stem, and its branches grow gradually smaller. It grows to stones, without a root, or without any way penetrating them; but as it is found to grow, and take in its nourishment, in the manner of plants, and to produce flowers and seeds, or at least a matter analogous to seeds, it properly belongs to the vegetable kingdom. Hill's Mat. Med.

In the sea, upon the south-west of Sicily, much coral is found. It is a submarine plant; it hath no leaves; it brancheth only when it is under water. It is soft, and green of colour; but being brought into the air, it becometh hard and shining red, as we see. Bacon's Natural History.

This gentleman, desirous to find the nature of coral, caused a man to go down a hundred fathom into the sea, with express orders to take notice whether it were hard or soft in the place where it groweth. Brown.

He hears the crackling sound of coral woods,
And sees the secret source of subterranean floods. Dryden's Virgil.

A turret was inclos'd
Within the wall, of alabaster white,
And crimson coral, for the queen of night,
Who takes in Sylvan sports her chaste delight. Dryd.

Or where's the sense, direct or moral,
That teeth are pearl, or lips are coral? Prior.

2. The piece of coral which children have about their necks, imagined to assist them in breeding teeth.

Her infant grandame's coral next it grew;
The bells she gingled, and the whistle blew. Pope.

CORAL-TREE, kŏr'ăl-trė̆. n. s. [corallodendron, Lat.]

It is a native of America, and produces very beautiful scarlet flowers; but never any seeds in the European gardens. Miller.

CO'RALLINE, kŏr'ăl-în.[150] adj. [corallinus, Lat.] Consisting of coral; approaching to coral.

At such time as the sea is agitated, it takes up into itself terrestrial matter of all kinds, and in particular the coralline matter, letting it fall again, as it becomes calm. Woodward.

CO'RALLINE, kŏr'ăl-în. n. s. [from the adjective.]

Coralline is a sea plant used in medicine; but much inferior to the coral in hardness, sometimes greenish, sometimes yellowish, often reddish, and frequently white. Hill.

In Falmouth there is a sort of sand, or rather coralline, that lies under the owse. Mortimer.

CO'RALLOID, kŏr'ăl-lòid. } adj. [κο-
CO'RALLOIDAL, kŏr-ăl-lòid'ăl. } ραλλοειδης.] Resembling coral.

Now that plants and ligneous bodies may indurate under water, without approachment of air, we have experiment in coralline, with many coralloidal concretions. Brown.

The pentadrous, columnar, coralloid bodies, that are composed of plates set lengthways of the body, and passing from the surface to the axis of it. Woodward on Fossils.

Cora'nt, kŏ-rânt'. n. s. [courant, Fr.] A lofty sprightly dance.

It is harder to dance a corant well than a jigg; so in conversation, even, easy, and agreeable, more than points of wit. Temple.

I would as soon believe a widow in great grief for her husband, because I saw her dance a corant about his coffin. Walsh.

Co'rban, kôr'bân.[168] n. s. [קרבן.] An alms-basket; a receptacle of charity; a gift; an alms.

They think to satisfy all obligations to duty by their corban of religion. King Charles.

Corban stands for an offering or gift made to God, or his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or the gifts offered unto God. If a man made all his fortune corban, or devoted it to God, he was forbidden to use it. If all that he was to give his wife, or his father and mother, was declared corban, he was no longer permitted to allow them necessary subsistence. Even debtors were permitted to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God. Our Saviour reproaches the Jews, in the Gospel, with these uncharitable and irreligious vows. By this word such persons were likewise meant, as devoted themselves to the service of God and his temple. Corban signifies also the treasury of the temple, where the offerings, which were made in money, were deposited. Calmet.

Corbe, kôrb. adj. [courbe, Fr.] Crooked.

For siker thy head very tottie is,
So thy corbe shoulder it leans amiss. Spenser.

Co'rbeils, kôr'bêlz. n. s. Little baskets used in fortification, filled with earth, and set upon the parapet, to shelter the men firing upon the besiegers.

Co'rbel, kôr'bêl. [In architecture.] The representation of a basket, sometimes placed on the heads of the caryatides.

Co'rbel, Co'rbil, kôr'bêl. n. s.

1. A short piece of timber sticking out six or eight inches from a wall, sometimes placed for strength under the semigirders of a platform.
2. A niche or hollow left in walls for figures or statues. Chambers.

CORD, kôrd. n. s. [cort, Welsh; chorda, Lat.; corde, Fr.]

1. A rope; a string composed of several strands or twists.

She let them down by a cord through the window. Jos. ii. 5.

Form'd of the finest complicated thread,
The num'rous cords are thro' the body spread. Blackmore.

2. The cords extended in setting up tents, furnish several metaphors in scripture.

Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; none of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. Isaiah, xxxiii. 20.

3. A quantity of wood for fuel, supposed to be measured with a cord; a pile eight feet long, four high, and four broad.

Cord-maker, kôrd'mâ-kûr. n. s. [cord and make.] One whose trade is to make ropes; a ropemaker.

Cord-wood, kôrd'wûd. n. s. [cord and wood.] Wood piled up for fuel, to be sold by the cord.

To Cord, kôrd. v. a. [from the noun.] To bind with ropes; to fasten with cords; to close by a bandage.

Co'rdage, kôr'dîdje.[90] n. s. [from cord.] A quantity of cords; the ropes of a ship.

Our cordage from her store, and cables, should be made,
Of any in that kind most fit for marine trade. Drayton.

They fastened their ships, and rid at anchor with cables of iron chains, having neither canvas nor cordage. Raleigh.

Spain furnished a sort of rush called spartum, useful for cordage and other parts of shipping. Arbuthnot on Coins.

Co'rded, kôr'dêd. adj. [from cord.] Made of ropes.

This night he meaneth, with a corded ladder,
To climb celestial Silvia's chamber window. Shak.

Cordeli'er, kôr-dê-lêêr'.[275] n. s. A Franciscan friar: so named from the cord which serves him for a cincture.

And who to assist but a grave cordelier. Prior.

CO'RDIAL, kôr'jê-âl.[294 376] n. s. [from cor, the heart, Lat.]

1. A medicine that increases the force of the heart, or quickens the circulation.
2. Any medicine that increases strength.

A cordial, properly speaking, is not always what increaseth the force of the heart; for, by increasing that, the animal may be weakened, as in inflammatory diseases. Whatever increaseth the natural or animal strength, the force of moving the fluids and muscles, is a cordial: these are such substances as bring the serum of the blood into the properest condition for circulation and nutrition; as broths made of animal substances, milk, ripe fruits, and whatever is endued with a wholesome but not pungent taste. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Any thing that comforts, gladdens, and exhilarates.

Then with some cordials seek for to appease
The inward languor of my wounded heart,
And then my body shall have shortly ease;
But such sweet cordials pass physicians' art. Spens.

Cordials of pity give me now,
For I too weak for purges grow. Cowley.

Your warrior offspring that upheld the crown,
The scarlet honour of your peaceful gown,
Are the most pleasing objects I can find,
Charms to my sight, and cordials to my mind. Dryden.

Co'rdial, kôr'jê-âl. adj.

1. Reviving; invigorating; restorative.

It is a thing I make, which hath the king
Five times redeem'd from death: I do not know
What is more cordial. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

He only took cordial waters, in which we infused sometimes purgatives. Wiseman's Surgery.

2. Sincere; hearty; proceeding from the heart; without hypocrisy.

Doctrines are infused among christians, which are apt to obstruct or intercept the cordial superstructing of Christian life of renovation, where the foundation is duly laid Hammond.

He, with looks of cordial love,
Hung over her enamour'd. Milton.

Co'rdiality, kôr-jê-âl'ê-tê. n. s. [from cordial.]

1. Relation to the heart.

That the ancients had any such respects of cordiality, or reference unto the heart, will much be doubted. Brown.

2. Sincerity; freedom from hypocrisy.

Co'rdially, kôr'jê-âl-ê. adv. [from cordial.] Sincerely; heartily; without hypocrisy.

Where a strong inveterate love of sin has made any doctrine or proposition wholly unsuitable to the heart, no argument, or demonstration, no nor miracle whatsoever, shall be able to bring the heart cordially to close with, and receive it. South's Serm.

Co'rdiner, kôr'd'nûr. n. s. [cordonnier, Fr.] A shoemaker. It is so used in divers statutes.

CO'RDON, kôr'dôn. n. s. [Fr.] In fortification, a row of stones jutting out before the rampart and the basis of the parapet. Chambers.

CO'RDWAIN, kôrd'wâne. n. s. [Cordovan leather, from Cordova in Spain.] Spanish leather.

Her straight legs most bravely were embay'd
In golden buskins of costly cordwain. Fairy Queen.

Cordwa'iner, kôrd-wâ-nûr. n. s. [uncertain whether from Cordovan, Spanish leather, or from cord, of which shoes were formerly made, and are now used in the Spanish West Indies. Trevoux.] A shoemaker.

CORE, kôre. n. s. [coeur, Fr.; cor, Lat.]

1. The heart.

Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core; ay, in my heart of heart. Shak.

2. The inner part of any thing.

In the core of the square she raised a tower of a furlong high. Raleigh's History of the World.

Dig out the cores below the surface. Mortimer.

They wasteful eat,
Through buds and bark, into the blacken'd core. Thomson.

3. The inner part of a fruit which contains the kernels.

It is reported that trees, watered perpetually with warm water, will make a fruit with little or no core or stone. Bacon.

4. The matter contained in a boil or sore.

Launce the sore,
And cut the head; for, till the core be found,
The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground. Dryden.

5. It is used by Bacon for a body or collection. [from corps, Fr. pronounced core.]

He was more doubtful of the raising of forces to resist the rebels, than of the resistance itself; for that he was in a core of people whose affections he suspected. Bacon's Henry VII.

Coria'ceous, kŏ-rê-â'shŭs. adj. [coriaceus, Lat.]

1. Consisting of leather.
2. Of a substance resembling leather.

A stronger projectile motion of the blood must occasion greater secretions and loss of liquid parts, and from thence perhaps spissitude and coriaceous concretions. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Coria'nder, kŏ-rê-ân'dûr.[98] n. s. [coriandrum, Lat.] A plant.

The species are, 1. Greater coriander. 2. Smaller testiculated coriander. The first is cultivated for the seeds, which are used in medicine: the second sort is seldom found. Miller.

Israel called the name thereof manna; and it was, like coriander seed, white. Exodus, xiii. 31.

CO'RINTH, kûr'rân. n. s. [from the city of that name in Greece.] A small fruit, commonly called currant.

Now will the corinths, now the rasps supply
Delicious draughts. Philips.

The chief riches of Zant consist in corinths, which the inhabitants have in great quantities. Broome.

Cori'nthian Order, kŏ-rin'thê'ân, is generally reckoned the fourth, but by some the fifth, of the five orders of architecture; and is the most noble, rich, and delicate of them all. Vitruvius ascribes it to Callimachus, a Corinthian sculptor, who is said to have taken the hint by passing by the tomb of a young lady, over which a basket with some of her playthings had been placed by her nurse, and covered with a tile; the whole having been placed over a root of acanthus. As it sprung up, the branches encompassed the basket; but arriving at the tile, bent downwards under the corners of it, forming a kind of volute. Hence Callimachus imitated the basket by the vase of his capital, the tile in the abacus, and the leaves in the volute. Villalpandus imagines the Corinthian capital to have taken its original from an order in the temple of Solomon, whose leaves were those of the palm-tree. The capital is adorned with two rows of leaves, between which little stalks arise, of which the sixteen volutes are formed, which support the abacus. Harris.

Behind these figures are large columns of the Corinthian order, adorned with fruit and flowers. Dryden.

CORK, kôrk. n. s. [cortex, Lat. korck, Dut.

Hic dies, anno redeunte, festus
Corticem astrictum pice dimovebit
Amphoræ fumum bibere institutæ
Consule Tullo. Hor.]

1. A glandiferous tree, in all respects like the ilex, excepting the bark, which, in the cork tree, is thick, spongy, and soft. Miller.

The cork tree grows near the Pyrenean hills, and in several parts of Italy, and the north of New England. Mortimer.

2. The bark of the cork tree used for stopples, or burnt into Spanish black. It is taken off without injury to the tree.

3. A piece of cork cut for the stopple of a bottle or barrel.

I pr'ythee take the cork out of thy mouth, that I may drink thy tidings. Shakspeare.

Be sure, nay very sure, thy cork be good;
Then future ages shall of Peggy tell,
That nymph that brew'd and bottled ale so well. King.

Nor stop, for one bad cork, his butler's pay. Pope.

CORKING-PIN, kôr-kîng-pîn'. n. s. A pin of the largest size.

When you put a clean pillow-case on your lady's pillow, be sure to fasten it well with three corking-pins, that it may not fall off in the night. Swift.

CO'RKY, kôr'kė. adj. [from cork.] Consisting of cork; resembling cork.

Bind fast his corky arms. Shaksp. King Lear.

CO'RMORANT, kôr'mô-rânt. n. s. [cormorant, Fr. from corvus marinus, Lat.]

1. A bird that preys upon fish. It is nearly of the bigness of a capon, with a wry bill and broad feet, black on his body, but greenish about his wings. He is eminently greedy and rapacious.

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Liv'd register'd upon our brazen tombs;
When, spite of cormorant devouring time,
Th' endeavour of this present breath may buy
That honour which shall 'bate his scythe's keen edge. Shakspeare.

Those called birds of prey, as the eagle, hawk, puttock, and cormorant. Peacham on Drawing.

Thence up he flew, and on the tree of life
Sat like a cormorant. Milton's Par. Lost.

Not far from thence is seen a lake, the haunt
Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant. Dryd. Fab.

2. A glutton.

CORN, kôrn. n. s. [corn, Sax. korn, Germ. It is found in all the Teutonick dialects; as, in an old Runick rhyme,

Hagul er kaldastur corna.
Hail is the coldest grain.]

1. The seeds which grow in ears, not in pods; such as are made into bread.

Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. John xii. 25.

The people cry you mock'd them; and, of late,
When corn was given them gratis, you repin'd. Shakspeare.

2. Grain yet unreaped, standing in the field upon its stalk.

All the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn. Shaksp. King Lear.

Landing his men he burnt the corn all thereabouts, which was now almost ripe. Knolles's History of the Turks.

Still a murmur runs
Along the soft inclining fields of corn. Thomson.

3. Grain in the ear, yet unthreshed.

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season. Job, v. 26.

4. An excrescence on the feet, hard and painful; probably so called from its form; though by some supposed to be denominated from its corneous or horny substance.

Ladies, that have your feet
Unplagu'd with corns, we'll have a bout with you. Shakspeare.

The man that makes his toe
What he his heart should make,
Shall of a corn cry woe,
And turn his sleep to wake. Shak. King Lear.

Even in men, aches and hurts and corns do engrieve either towards rain or towards frost. Bacon.

The hardest part of the corn is usually in the middle, thrusting itself in a nail; whence it has the Latin appellation of clavis. Wiseman.

He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretold the gath'ring rain. Gay's Pastorals.

It looks as there were regular accumulations and gatherings of humours, growing perhaps in some people as corns. Arbuthnot.

Thus Lamb, renown'd for cutting corns,
An offer'd fee from Radcliff scorns. Swift.

To CORN, kôrn. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To salt; to sprinkle with salt. The word is so used, as Skinner observes, by the old Saxons.

2. To granulate.

CORN-FIELD, kôrn'fêêld. n. s. A field where corn is growing.

It was a lover and his lass,
That o'er the green corn-field did pass. Shaksp.

You may soon enjoy the gallant sights of armies, encampments, and standards waving over your brother's cornfields. Pope.

CORN-FLAG, kôrn'flâg. n. s. [corn and flag.] A plant.

Miller enumerates eleven species of this plant, some with red flowers, and some with white.

CORN-FLOOR, kôrn'flôre. n. s. The floor where corn is stored.

Thou hast loved a reward upon every corn-floor. Hos. ix. 1.

CORN-FLOWER, kôrn'flôû-ûr. n. s. [from corn and flower.]

There be certain corn-flowers, which come seldom or never in other places, unless they be set, but only amongst corn; as the blue-bottle, a kind of yellow marygold, wild poppy, and furmitory. Bacon's Natural History.

Corn-flowers are of many sorts: some of them flower in June and July, and others in August. The seeds should be sown in March: they require a good soil. Mortimer.

CORN-LAND, kôrn-lând. n. s. [corn and land.] Land appropriated to the production of grain.

Pastures and meadows are of such advantage to husbandry, that many prefer them to corn lands. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CORN-MASTER, kôrn-mâs-tûr.[76] [98] n. s. [corn and master.] One that cultivates corn for sale. Not in use.

I knew a nobleman in England, that had the greatest audits of any man in my time; a great grasier, a great sheep-master, a great timber-man, a great collier, a great corn-master, and a great lead-man. Bacon.

CORN-MARIGOLD, kôrn-mâr-rè-gôld.[81] n. s. [from corn and marigold.] A flower.

CORN-MILL, kôrn-mîl. n. s. [corn and mill.] A mill to grind corn into meal.

Save the more laborious work of beating of hemp, by making the axle-tree of the corn-mills longer than ordinary, and placing pins in it to raise large hammers. Mortimer.

CORN-PIPE, kôrn-pîpe. n. s. [from corn and pipe.] A pipe made by slitting the joint of a green stalk of corn.

Now the shrill corn-pipes, echoing loud to arms,
To rank and file reduce the straggling swarms. Tickel.

CORN-ROCKET, kôrn-rôk-kît.[99] n. s. [from corn and rocket.] A plant.

CORN-ROSE, kôrn-rôze. n. s. A species of poppy.

CORN-SALLAD, kôrn-sâl-lâd. n. s. [from corn and sallad.]

Corn-sallad is an herb, whose top-leaves are a sallet of themselves. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CO'RNAGE, kôr'nîdje.[90] n. s. [from corne, Fr. cornu. Lat.] A tenure which obliges the landholder to give notice of an invasion by blowing a horn.

CO'RNCHANDLER, kôrn'tshând-lûr. n. s. [corn and chandler.] One that retails corn.

CO'RNCUTTER, kôrn'kût-tûr. n. s. [from corn and cut.] A man whose profession is to extirpate corns from the foot.

The nail was not loose, nor did seem to press into the flesh; for there had been a corncutter, who had cleared it. Wiseman.

I have known a corncutter, who, with a right education, would have been an excellent physician. Spectator.

CO'RNEL, kôr'nêl.
CORNE'LIAN-TREE, kôr-nê'lê-ân-trêê. } n. s. [cornus, Lat.]

The cornel-tree beareth the fruit commonly called the cornel or cornelian cherry, as well from the name of the tree, as the cornelian stone, the colour whereof it somewhat represents. The wood is very durable, and useful for wheel-work. Mortimer.

Take a service-tree, or a cornelian-tree, or an elder tree, which we know have fruits of harsh and binding juice, and set them near a vine or fig-tree, and see whether the grapes or figs will not be the sweeter. Bacon's Natural History.

A huntress issuing from the wood,
Reclining on her cornel spear she stood. Dryden.
Mean time the goddess, in disdain, bestows
The mast and acorn, brutal food! and strows
The fruits of cornel, as they feast around. Pope.
On wildings and on strawberries they fed;
Cornels and bramble-berries gave the rest,
And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast. Dryden.

CORNE'LIAN-STONE, kŏr-nē'lē-ăn-stōne. See CARNELIAN.

COR'NEMUSE, kŏrn'mūse. n. s. [Fr.] A kind of rustic flute.

CO'RNEOUS, kŏr'nē-ŭs. adj. [corneus, Lat.] Horny; of a substance resembling horn.

Such as have corneous or horny eyes, as lobsters, and crustaceous animals, are generally dimsighted. Brown.

The various submarine shrubs are of a corneous or ligneous constitution, consisting chiefly of a fibrous matter. Woodward.

CO'RNER, kŏr'nŭr.[98] n. s. [cornel, Welsh cornier, Fr.]

1. An angle; a place inclosed by two walls or lines, which would intersect each other, if drawn beyond the point where they meet.
2. A secret or remote place.

There 's nothing I have done yet, o' my conscience,
Deserves a corner. Shakspeare's Henry VIII.

It is better to dwell in a corner of a house top, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house. Proverbs, xxv. 24.

I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner. Acts, xxvi. 26.

All the inhabitants, in every corner of the island, have been absolutely reduced under his immediate subjection. Davies.

Those vices, that lurk in the secret corners of the soul. Addison.

3. The extremities; the utmost limit: thus every corner is the whole or every part.

Might I but through my prison, once a day,
Behold this maid, all corners else o' th' earth
Let liberty make use of. Shakspeare's Tempest.

I turn'd, and tried each corner of my bed,
To find if sleep were there; but sleep was lost. Dryd.

CORNER-STONE, kŏr'nŭr-stōne'. n. s. [corner and stone.] The stone that unites the two walls at the corner; the principal stone.

See you yond' coin o' th' capitol, yond corner-stone? Shakspeare.

A mason was fitting a corner-stone. Howel.

CORNER-TEETH of a Horse, kŏr'nŭr-tēēth, are the fore teeth between the middling teeth and the tushes; two above and two below, on each side of the jaw, which shoot when the horse is four years and a half old. Farrier's Dict.

CO'RNERWISE. kŏr'nŭr-wīze adv. [corner and wise.] Diagonally; with the corner in front.

CO'RNET, kŏr'nĕt.[99] n s. [cornette, Fr.]

1. A musical instrument blown with the mouth: used anciently in war, probably in the cavalry.

Israel played before the Lord on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets. 2 Sam. vi. 5.

Other wind instruments require a forcible breath; as trumpets, cornets, and hunter's horns. Bacon.

Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear;
Under an actor's nose, he 's never near. Dryden.

2. A company or troop of horse; perhaps as many as had a cornet belonging to them. This sense is now disused.

These noblemen were appointed, with some cornets of horse and bands of foot, to put themselves beyond the hill where the rebels were encamped. Bacon.

Seventy great horses lay dead in the field, and one cornet was taken. Hayward.

They discerned a body of five cornets of horse very full, standing in very good order to receive them. Clarendon.

3. The officer that bears the standard of a troop.
4. Cornet of a Horse, is the lowest part of his pastern, that runs round the coffin, and is distinguished by the hair that joins and covers the upper part of the hoof. Farrier's Dict.
5. A scarf anciently worn by doctors. Dict.
6. A head dress. Dict.
7. Cornet of Paper, is described by Skinner to be a cap of paper, made by retailers for small wares.

CO'RNETTER, kŏr'nĕt-tŭr. n. s. [from cornet.] A blower of the cornet.

So great was the rabble of trumpetters, cornetters, and other musicians, that even Claudius himself might have heard them. Hakewill.

CO'RNICE, kŏr'nĭs.[142] n. s. [corniche, Fr.] The highest projection of a wall or column.

The cornice of the Palazzo Farnese, which makes so beautiful an effect below, when viewed more nearly, will be found not to have its just measures. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

The walls were massy brass, the cornice high
Blue metals crown'd, in colours of the sky. Pope.

CORNICE Ring. [In gunnery.] The next ring from the muzzle backwards. Chambers.

CO'RNICLE, kŏr'nĭk-kl.[405] n. s. [from cornu, Lat.] A little horn.

There will be found, on either side, two black filaments, or membranous strings, which extend unto the long and shorter cornicle, upon protrusion. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CORNI'CULATE, kŏr-nĭk'kū-lāte.[91] adj. [from cornu, Lat.] A term in botany.

Corniculate plants are such as produce many distinct and horned pods; and corniculate flowers are such hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of spur, or little horn. Chambers.

CORNI'FICK, kŏr-nĭf'fĭk.[509] adj. [from cornu and facio, Lat.] Productive of horns; making horns. Dict.

CORNI'GEROUS, kŏr-nĭdje'ē-rŭs. adj. [corniger, Lat.] Horned; having horns.

Nature, in other cornigerous animals, hath placed the horns higher, and reclining; as in bucks. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CORNUCO'PIÆ, kŏr-nū-kō'pē-ē. n. s. [Lat.] The horn of plenty; a horn topped with fruits and flowers in the hands of a goddess.

To CORNU'TE, kŏr-nūte'. v. a. [cornutus, Lat.] To bestow horns; to cuckold.

CORNU'TED, kŏr-nū'tĕd. adj. [cornutus, Lat.] Grafted with horns; horned; cuckolded.

CORNU'TO, kŏr-nū'tō. n. s. [from cornutus, Lat.] A man horned; a cuckold.

The peaking cornuto, her husband, dwelling in a continual larum of jealousy. Shakspeare.

CO'RNY, kŏr'nē. adj. [from cornu, horn, Lat.]

1. Strong or hard like horn; horny.

Up stood the corny reed,
Embattel'd in her field. Milton's Par. Lost

2. [from corn.] Producing grain or corn.

Tell me why the ant,
Midst summer's plenty, thinks of winter's want;
By constant journeys careful to prepare
Her stores, and bringing home the corny ear. Prior.

3. Containing corn.

They lodge in habitations not their own,
By their high crops and corny gizzards known. Dryden.

CO'ROLLARY, kŏr'ō-lăr-ē.[168] n. s. [corallarium, Lat. from corolla; finis coronat opus: corollair, Fr.]

1. The conclusion: a corollary seems to be a conclusion, whether following from the premises necessarily or not.

Now since we have considered the malignity of this sin of detraction, it is but a natural corollary, that we enforce our vigilance against it. Government of the Tongue.

As a corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others, I owe somewhat to myself. Dryden's Fables, Preface.

2. Surplus.

Bring a corollary,
Rather than want. Shakspeare's Tempest.

CORO'NA, kŏr-ō'nă. n. s. [Lat.] A large flat member of the cornice, so called because it crowns the entablature and the whole order. It is called by workmen the drip. Chambers.

In a cornice the gola or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions or dentelli, make a noble shew by their graceful projections. Spectator.

CO'RONAL, kŏr'ō-năl.[168] n. s. [corona, Lat.] A crown; a garland.

Crown ye god Bacchus with a coronal,
And Hymen also crown with wreaths of vine. Spenser.

CO'RONAL, kō-rō'năl. adj. Belonging to the top of the head.

A man of about forty-five years of age came to me, with a round tubercle between the sagittal and coronal suture. Wiseman.

CO'RONARY, kŏr'ō-năr-ē. adj. [coronarius, Lat.]

1. Relating to a crown; seated on the top of the head like a crown.

The basilisk of older times was a proper kind of serpent, not above three palms long, as some account; and differenced from other serpents by advancing his head, and some white marks, or coronary spots, upon the crown. Brown.

2. It is applied in anatomy to arteries, which are fancied to encompass the heart in the manner of a garland.

The substance of the heart itself is most certainly made and nourished by the blood, which is conveyed to it by the coronary arteries. Bentley.

CORONA'TION, kŏr-ō-nā'shŭn. n. s. [from corona, Lat.]

1. The act or solemnity of crowning a king.

Fortune smiling at her work therein, that a scaffold of execution should grow a scaffold of coronation. Sidney.

Willingly I came to Denmark,
To show my duty in your coronation. Shakspeare.

A cough, Sir, which I caught with ringing in the king's affair upon his coronation day. Shakspeare.

Now empress fame had publish'd the renown
Of Sh——'s coronation through the town. Dryden.

2. The pomp or assembly present at a coronation.

In pensive thought recal the fancied scene,
See coronations rise on every green. Pope

Co'RONER, kŏr'ŏ-nûr. n. s. [from corona.] An officer whose duty is to inquire, on the part of the king, how any violent death was occasioned; for which purpose a jury is impannelled.

Go thou and seek the coroner, and let him sit o' my uncle; for he 's in the third degree of drink; he 's drowned. Shakspeare.

Co'RONET, kŏr'ŏ-nêt. n. s. [coronetta, Ital. the diminutive of corona, a crown.]

1. An inferiour crown worn by the nobility. The coronet of a duke is adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis has leaves with pearls interposed; that of an earl raises the pearls above the leaves; that of a viscount is surrounded with only pearls; that of a baron has only four pearls.

In his livery
Walk'd crowns and coronets; realms and islands were
As plates dropt from his pocket. Shakspeare.

All the rest are countesses.
——Their coronets say so. Shakspeare's Henry VIII.

Nor could our nobles hope their bold attempt,
Who ruin'd crowns, would coronets exempt. Dryd.

Peers and dukes, and all their sweeping train,
And garters, stars, and coronets appear. Pope.

2. An ornamental head-dress, in poetical language.

The rest was drawn into a coronet of gold, richly set with pearl. Sidney.

Under a coronet his flowing hair,
In curls, on either cheek play'd. Milton's Par. Lost.

Co'RPORAL, kŏr'pŏ-rål.[168] n. s. [corrupted from caporal, Fr.] The lowest officer of the infantry, whose office is to place and remove the sentinels.

The cruel corp'ral whisper'd in my ear,
Five pounds, if rightly tipt, would set me clear. Gay.

Co'RPORAL of a Ship, kŏr'pŏ-rål. An officer that hath the charge of setting the watches and sentries, and relieving them; who sees that all the soldiers and sailors keep their arms neat and clean, and teaches them how to use them. He has a mate under him. Harris.

CO'RPORAL, kŏr'pŏ-rål. adj. [corporel, Fr. corpus, Lat.]

1. Relating to the body; belonging to the body.

To relief of lazars and weak age,
Of indigent faint souls past corporal toil,
A hundred alms-houses right well supplied. Shaksp.

Render to me some corporal sign about her,
More evident than this. Shakspeare's Cymbeline.

That God hath been otherwise seen, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding. Raleigh.

Beasts enjoy greater sensual pleasures, and feel fewer corporal pains; and are utter strangers to all those anxious and tormenting thoughts, which perpetually haunt and disquiet mankind. Atterbury.

2. Material; not spiritual. In the present language, when body is used philosophically in opposition to spirit, the word corporeal is used, as, a corporeal being; but otherwise corporal. Corporeal is, having a body; corporal, relating to the body. This distinction seems not ancient.

Whither are they vanish'd?
Into the air; and what seem'd corporal
Melted, as breath, into the wind. Shaksp. Macb.

And from these corporal nutriments, perhaps,
Your bodies may at last turn all to spirit. Milton.

Corpora'lity, kŏr-pŏ-răl'ĕ-tè. n. s. [from corporal.] The quality of being embodied.

If this light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then, of all other, the most subtile and pure. Raleigh's History.

Co'rporally, kŏr'pŏ-răl-ĕ. adv. [from corporal.] Bodily.

The sun is corporally conjoined with basiliscus. Brown.

CO'RPORATE, kŏr'pŏ-rāte.[91] adj. [from corpus, Lat.]

1. United in a body or community; enabled to act in legal processes as an individual.

Breaking forth like a sudden tempest, he overrun all Munster and Connaught, defacing and utterly subverting all corporate towns that were not strongly walled. Spenser on Ireland.

The nobles of Athens being not at this time a corporate assembly, therefore the resentment of the commons was usually turned against particular persons. Swift.

2. General; united.

They answer in a joint and corporate voice,
That now they are at fall. Shaksp. Timon.

Co'rporateness, kŏr'pŏ-rāte-nĕs. n. s. [from corporate.] The state of a body corporate; a community. Dict.

Corpora'tion, kŏr'pŏ-rā-shŭn. n. s. [from corpus, Lat.]

A corporation is a body politick, authorized by the king's charter to have a common seal, one head officer or more, and members, able, by their common consent, to grant or receive, in law, any thing within the compass of their charter: even as one man may do by law all things, that by law he is not forbidden; and bindeth the successors, as a single man binds his executor or heir. Cowell.

Of angels we are not to consider only what they are, and do, in regard to their own being; but that also which concerneth them, as they are linked into a kind of corporation amongst themselves, and of society with men. Hooker.

Of this we find some foot-steps in our law,
Which doth her root from God and nature take;
Ten thousand men she doth together draw,
And of them all one corporation make. Davies.

Co'rporature, kŏr'pŏ-rā-tshŭre. n. s. [from corpus, Lat.] The state of being embodied. Dict.

Corpo'real, kŏr-pŏ'rè-ăl. adj. [corporeus, Lat.]

1. Having a body; not immaterial; not spiritual. See Corporal.

The swiftness of those circles attribute,
Though numberless, to his omnipotence,
That to corporeal substances could add
Speed almost spiritual. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Having surveyed the image of God in the soul, we are not to omit those characters that God imprinted upon the body, as much as a spiritual substance could be pictured upon a corporeal. South.

God being supposed to be a pure spirit, cannot be the object of any corporeal sense. Tillotson.

The course is finish'd which thy fates decreed,
And thou from thy corporeal poison freed. Dryden.

Fix thy corporeal and internal eye
On the young gnat, or new engender'd fly. Prior.

2. It is used by Swift inaccurately for corporal.

I am not in a condition to make a true step even on Aimsbury Downs; and I declare, that a corporeal false step is worse than a political one. Swift.

Corpore'ity, kŏr-pŏ-rè'ĕ-tè. n. s. [from corporeus, Lat.] Materiality; the quality of being embodied; the state of having a body; bodiliness.

Since philosophy affirmeth, that we are middle substances between the soul and the body, they must admit of some corporeity, which supposeth weight or gravity. Brown.

It is the saying of divine Plato, that man is nature's horizon, dividing betwixt the upper hemisphere of immaterial intellects, and this lower of corporeity. Glanville's Scepsis.

The one attributed corporeity to God, and the other shape and figure. Stilling fleet.

Corporifica'tion, kŏr-pŏ-rĭf-ĕ-kā'shŭn. n. s. [from corporify.] The act of giving body or palpability.

To Corpo'rify, kŏr-pŏr'ĕ-fī. v. a. [from corpus, Lat.] To embody; to inspissate into body. Not used.

A certain spirituous substance, extracted out of it, is mistaken for the spirit of the world corporified. Boyle.

Corps, kŏre. plural kŏrz. } n. s. [corps,
Corpse, kŏrps.[168] } Fr. corpus, Lat.]

1. A body.

That rude ribauld
Laid first his filthy hands on virgin cleene,
To spoil her dainty corse, so fair and sheene,
Of chastity and honour virginal. Spenser.

2. A body, in contempt.

Though plenteous, all too little seems
To stuff this man, this vast unhide-bound corps. Milton.

He looks as man was made, with face erect,
That scorns his brittle corps, and seems asham'd
He's not all spirit. Dryden's Don Sebastian.

3. A carcase; a dead body; a corse.

Not a friend
Greet my poor corps, where my bones shall be thrown. Shakspeare.

There was the murder'd corps in covert laid,
And violent death in thousand shapes display'd. Dryden's Fables.

See where the corps of thy dead son approaches. Addison.

The corpse was laid out upon the floor by the emperor's command: he then bid every one light his flambeau, and stand about the dead body. Addison.

4. The body, in opposition to the soul.

Cold numbness streight bereaves
Her corps of sense, and th' air her soul receives. Denham.

5. A body of forces.

Co'rpulence, kŏr'pŭ-lĕnse. } n. s. [cor-
Co'rpulency, kŏr'pŭ-lĕn-sè. } pulentia, Lat.]

1. Bulkiness of body; fleshiness; fulness of flesh.

To what a cumbersome unwieldiness,
And burdenous corpulence, my love had grown. Donne.

It is but one species of corpulency; for there may be bulk without fat, from the great quantity of muscular flesh, the case of robust people. Arbuthnot.

2. Spissitude; grossness of matter.

The musculous flesh serves for the vibration of the tail; the heaviness and corpulency of the water requiring a great force to divide it. Ray.

Co'rpulent, kŏr'pŭ-lĕnt. adj. [corpulentus, Lat.] Fleshy; bulky; having great bodily bulk.

We say it is a fleshy stile, when there is much periphrases, and circuit of words; and when, with more than enough, it grows fat and corpulent. Ben Jonson's Discoveries.

Excess of nourishment is hurtful; for it maketh the child corpulent, and growing in breadth rather than in height. Bacon.

CO'RPUSCLE, kŏr'pŭs-sl.[351 405] n. s.

corpusculum, Lat.] A small body; a particle of matter; an atom; a little fragment.

It will add much to our satisfaction, if those corpuscles can be discovered with microscopes. Newton's Opticks.

Who knows what are the figures of the little corpuscles that compose and distinguish different bodies? Watts's Logick.

CORPU'SCULAR, kôr-pŭs'kŭ-lâr.
CORPUSCULA'RIAN, kôr-pŭs-kŭ-lâ'rê-ân. adj. [from corpusculum, Lat.] Relating to bodies; comprising bodies. It is the distinguishing epithet of that philosophy, which attempts the rational solution of all physical appearances by the action of one body upon another.

As to natural philosophy, I do not expect to see any principles proposed, more comprehensive and intelligible than the corpuscularian or mechanical. Boyle.

This may be said, that the modern corpuscularians talk, in most things, more intelligibly than the peripateticks. Bentley.

The mechanical or corpuscular philosophy, though peradventure the eldest, as well as the best in the world, had lain dead for many ages in contempt and oblivion. Bentley.

CO'RRACLE, kŏr'râ-kl. See CORRICLE.

To CORRA'DE, kôr-râde'.[168] v. a. [corrado, Lat.] To rub off; to wear away by frequent rubbing; to scrape together.

CORRADIA'TION, kôr-râ-dê-â'shŭn. n. s. [con and radius, Lat.] A conjunction of rays in one point.

The impression of colour worketh not but by a cone of direct beams, or right lines, whereof the basis is in the object, and the vertical point in the eye; so as there is a corradiation, and conjunction of beams. Bacon's Natural History.

To CORRE'CT, kôr-rêkt'. v. a. [corrigo, correctum, Lat.]

1. To punish; to chastise; to discipline.

Sad accidents, and a state of affliction, is a school of virtue; it corrects levity, and interrupts the confidence of sinning. Taylor.

After he has once been corrected for a lye, you must be sure never after to pardon it in him. Locke.

Children being to be restrained by the parents only in vicious things, a look or nod only ought to correct them when they do amiss. Locke.

2. To amend; to take away faults in writings, life, or things.

This is a defect in the first make of some men's minds, which can scarce ever be corrected afterwards, either by learning or age. Burnet.

Correcting Nature, from what actually she is in individuals, to what she ought to be, and what she was created. Dryden.

I writ, because it amused me; I corrected, because it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write. Pope's Preface.

The mind may cool, and be at leisure to attend to its domestic concern: to consider what habit wants to be corrected, and what inclination to be subdued. Rogers.

3. To obviate the qualities of one ingredient by another, or by any method of preparation.

O happy mixture! wherein things contrary do so qualify and correct the one the danger of the other's excess, that neither boldness can make us presume, as long as we are kept under with the sense of our own wretchedness; nor, while we trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus, fear be able to tyrannize over us. Hooker.

As, in habitual gout or stone,
The only thing that can be done,
Is to correct your drink and diet,
And keep the inward foe in quiet. Prior.

In cases of acidity, water is the proper drink: its quality of relaxing may be corrected by boiling it with some animal substances; as ivory or hartshorn. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. To remark faults.

CORRE'CT, kôr-rêkt'. adj. [correctus, Lat.] Revised or finished with exactness; free from faults.

What verse can do, he has perform'd in this,
Which he presumes the most correct of his. Dryden.

Always use the most correct editions: various readings will be only troublesome where the sense is complete. Felton.

CORRE'CTION, kôr-rêk'shŭn. n. s. [from correct.]

1. Punishment; discipline; chastisement; penalty.

Wilt thou, pupil like,
Take thy correction mildly, kiss the rod? Shaksp.

An offensive wife,
That hath enrag'd him on to offer strokes,
As he is striking, holds his infant up,
And hangs resolv'd correction in the arm
That was uprear'd to execution. Shakspeare.

We are all but children here under the great master of the family; and he is pleased, by hopes and fears, by mercies and corrections, to instruct us in virtue. Watts.

One fault was too great lenity to her servants, to whom she gave good counsel, but too gentle correction. Arbuthnot.

2. Alteration to a better state; the act of taking away faults; amendment.

Another poet, in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if, at least, they live long enough to deserve correction. Dryden.

3. That which is substituted in the place of any thing wrong.

Corrections or improvements should be adjoined, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places. Watts.

4. Reprehension; animadversion.

They proceed with judgment and ingenuity, establishing their assertions not only with great solidity, but submitting them also unto the correction of future discovery. Brown.

5. Abatement of noxious qualities, by the addition of something contrary.

To make ambitious, wholesome, do not take
A dram of country's dulness; do not add
Corrections, but as chymists purge the bad. Donne.

CORRE'CTIONER, kôr-rêk'shŭn-ûr. n. s. [from correction.] One that has been in the house of correction; a jail-bird. This seems to be the meaning in Shakspeare.

I will have you soundly swinged for this, you blue-bottle rogue! you filthy famished correctioner! Shakspeare's Henry IV.

CORRE'CTIVE, kôr-rêk'tîv.[157] adj. [from correct.] Having the power to alter or obviate any bad qualities.

Mulberries are pectoral, corrective of bilious alkali. Arbuthnot.

CORRE'CTIVE, kôr-rêk'tîv. n. s.

1. That which has the power of altering or obviating any thing amiss.

The hair, wool, feathers, and scales, which all animals of prey do swallow, are a seasonable and necessary corrective, to prevent their greediness from filling themselves with too succulent a food. Ray.

Humanly speaking, and according to the method of the world, and the little correctives supplied by art and discipline, it seldom fails but an ill principle has its course, and nature makes good its blow. South's Sermons.

2. Limitation; restriction.

There seems to be such an instance in the regiment which the human soul exerciseth in relation to the body, that, with certain correctives and exceptions may give some kind of explication or adumbration thereof. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

CORRE'CTLY, kôr-rêkt'lê. adv. [from correct.] Accurately; exactly; without faults.

There are ladies, without knowing what tenses and participles, adverbs and prepositions are, speak as properly and as correctly as most gentlemen who have been bred up in the ordinary methods of grammar schools. Locke on Education.

Such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
Correctly cold, and regularly low. Pope.

CORRE'CTNESS, kôr-rêkt'nês. n. s. [from correct.] Accuracy; exactness; freedom from faults.

Too much labour often takes away the spirit, by adding to the polishing; so that there remains nothing but a dull correctness, a piece without any considerable faults, but with few beauties. Dryden.

The softness of the flesh, the delicacy of the shape, air, and posture, and the correctness of design, in this statue, are inexpressible. Addison on Italy.

Late, very late, correctness grew our care,
When the tir'd nation breath'd from civil war. Pope.

Those pieces have never before been printed from the true copies, or with any tolerable degree of correctness. Swift.

CORRE'CTOR, kôr-rêk'tûr.[98] n. s. [from correct.]

1. He that amends, or alters, by punishment or animadversion.

How many does zeal urge rather to do justice on some sins, than to forbear all sin! How many rather to be correctors than practisers of religion. Spratt's Sermons.

With all his faults, he sets up to be an universal reformer and corrector of abuses, and a remover of grievances. Swift.

2. He that revises any thing to free it from faults; as the corrector of the press, that amends the errours committed in printing.

I remember a person, who, by his style and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge press in Little-Britain, proceeding gradually to an author. Swift.

3. In medicine.

Such an ingredient in a composition, as guards against or abates the force of another; as the lixivial salts prevent the grievous vellications of resinous purges, by dividing their particles, and preventing their adhesion to the intestinal membranes; and as spices and carminative seeds assist the operation of some catharticks, by dissipating wind. In making a medicine, such a thing is called a corrector, which destroys or diminishes a quality that could not otherwise be dispensed with; thus turpentines are correctors of quicksilver, by destroying its fluxility, and making it capable of mixture. Quincy.

To CO'RRELATE, kŏr-rê-lâte'. v. n. [from con and relatus, Lat.] To have a reciprocal relation, as father and son.

CO'RRELATE, kŏr'ê-lâte. n. s. One that stands in the opposite relation.

It is one thing for a father to cease to be a father, by casting off his son; and another for him to cease to be so, by the death of his son: in this the relation is at an end for want of a correlate. South.

CORRE'LATIVE, kôr-rêl'â-tîv. adj. [con and relativus, Lat.] Having a reciprocal relation, so that the existence of one in a particular state depends upon the existence of another.

Father and son, husband and wife, and such other correlative terms, seem nearly to belong one to another. South.

Giving is a relative action, and so requires a correlative to answer it: giving on one part, transfers no property, unless there be an accepting on the other. South.

CORRE'LATIVENESS, kŏr-rĕl'ă-tĭv-nĕs. n. s. [from correlative.] The state of being correlative.

CORRE'PTION, kŏr-rĕp'shŭn. n. s. [corripio, correptum, Lat.] Objurgation; chiding; reprehension; reproof.

If we must be talking of other people's faults, let it not be to defame, but to amend them, by converting our detraction into admonition and fraternal correption. Government of the Tongue.

To CORRESPO'ND, kŏr-rĕ-spŏnd'. v. n. [con and respondeo, Lat.]

1. To suit; to answer; to be proportionate; to be adequate to; to be adapted to; to fit.

The days, if one be compared with another successively throughout the year, are found not to be equal, and will not justly correspond with any artificial or mechanical equal measures of time. Holder on Time.

Words being but empty sounds, any farther than they are signs of our ideas, we cannot but assent to them, as they correspond to those ideas we have, but no farther than that. Locke.

2. To keep up commerce with another by alternate letters.

CORRESPO'NDENCE, kŏr-rĕ-spŏn'dĕnse. } CORRESPO'NDENCY, kŏr-rĕ-spŏn'dĕn-sĕ. } n. s. [from correspond.]

1. Relation; reciprocal adaptation of one thing to another.

Between the law of their heavenly operations, and the actions of men in this our state of mortality, such correspondence there is as maketh it expedient to know in some sort the one, for the other's more perfect direction. Hooker.

Whatever we fancy, things keep their course; and their habitudes, correspondencies, and relations keep the same to one another. Locke.

2. Intercourse; reciprocal intelligence.

I had discovered those unlawful correspondencies they had used, and engagements they had made to embroil my kingdoms. King Charles.

Sure the villains hold a correspondence
With the enemy, and thus they would betray us. Denham.

It happens very oddly, that the pope and I should have the same thought much about the same time; my enemies will be apt to say, that we hold a correspondence together, and act by concert in this matter. Addison.

3. Friendship; interchange of offices or civilities.

Let such military persons be assured, and well reputed of, rather than factious and popular; holding also good correspondence with the other great men in the state. Bacon.

CORRESPO'NDENT, kŏr-rĕ-spŏn'dĕnt. adj. [from correspond.] Suitable; adapted; agreeable; answerable.

What good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work, according to the law which himself hath eternally purposed to keep. Hooker.

And as five zones th' etherial regions bind,
Five correspondent are to earth assign'd. Dryden.

CORRESPO'NDENT, kŏr-rĕ-spŏn'dĕnt. n. s. One with whom intelligence or commerce is kept up by mutual messages or letters.

He was pleased to command me to send to him, and receive from him all his letters from and to all his correspondents at home and abroad. Denham.

CORRESPO'NSIVE, kŏr-rĕ-spŏn'sĭv. adj. [from correspond.] Answerable; adapted to any thing.

Priam's six gates i' th' city, with massy staples,
And corresponsive and fulfilling bolts,
Sperre up the sons of Troy. Shakspeare.

CO'RRIDOR, kŏr-rĕ-dōre'. n. s. [Fr.]

1. [In fortification.] The covert way lying round the whole compass of the fortifications of a place.

2. [In architecture.] A gallery or long isle round about a building, leading to several chambers at a distance from each other. Harris.

There is something very noble in the amphitheatre, though the high wall and corridors that went round it are almost entirely ruined. Addison.

CO'RRIGIBLE, kŏr'rĕ-jĕ-bl. adj. [from corrigo, Lat.]

1. That which may be altered or amended.

2. He who is a proper object of punishment; punishable.

He was taken up very short, and adjudged corrigible for such presumptuous language. Howel.

3. Corrective; having the power to correct. Not proper, nor used.

Our bodies are our gardens, to the which our wills are gardeners; so that, if we will either have it steril with idleness, or manured with industry, the power and corrigible authority of this lies in our will. Shakspeare's Othello.

CORRI'VAL, kŏr-rī'văl. n. s. [con and rival.] Rival; competitor.

They had governours commonly out of the two families of the Geraldines and Butlers, both adversaries and corrivals one against the other. Spenser.

He, that doth redeem her thence, might wear
Without corrival all her dignities. Shak. H. IV.

CORRI'VALRY, kŏr-rī'văl-rĕ. n. s. [from corrival.] Competition; opposition.

CORRO'BORANT, kŏr-rŏb'ŏ-rănt. adj. [from corroborate.] Having the power to give strength.

There be divers sorts of bracelets fit to comfort the spirits; and they be of three intentions, refrigerant, corroborant, and aperient. Bacon.

To CORRO'BORATE, kŏr-rŏb'ŏ-rāte. v. a. [con and roboro, Lat.]

1. To confirm; to establish.

Machiavel well noteth, though in an ill-favoured instance, there is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words, except it be corroborate by custom. Bacon.

2. To strengthen; to make strong.

To fortify imagination there be three ways; the authority whence the belief is derived, means to quicken and corroborate the imagination, and means to repeat it and refresh it. Bacon

It was said that the prince himself had, by the sight of foreign courts, and observations on the different natures of people, and rules of government, much excited and awaked his spirits, and corroborated his judgment. Wotton.

As any limb well and duly exercised grows stronger, the nerves of the body are corroborated thereby. Watts.

CORROBORA'TION, kŏr-rŏb-ŏ-rā'shŭn. n s. [from corroborate.] The act of strengthening or confirming; confirmation by some additional security; addition of strength.

The lady herself procured a bull, for the better corroboration of the marriage. Bacon.

CORRO'BORATIVE, kŏr-rŏb'ŏ-rā-tĭv. adj. [from corroborate.] Having the power of increasing strength.

In the cure of an ulcer, with a moist intemperies, as the heart is weakened by too much humidity, you are to mix corroboratives of an astringent faculty; and the ulcer also requireth to be dried. Wiseman.

To CORRO'DE, kŏr-rōde'. v. a. [corrodo, Lat.] To eat away by degrees, as a menstruum; to prey upon; to consume; to wear away gradually.

Statesmen purge vice with vice, and may corrode
The bad with bad, a spider with a toad;
For so ill thralls not them, but they tame ill,
And make her do much good against her will. Donne.

We know that aqua-fortis corroding copper, which is it that gives the colour to verdigrease, is wont to reduce it to a green-blue solution. Boyle.

The nature of mankind, left to itself, would soon have fallen into dissolution, without the incessant and corroding invasions of so long a time. Hale.

Hannibal the Pyreneans past,
And steepy Alps, the mounds that nature cast;
And with corroding juices, as he went,
A passage through the living rock he rent. Dryden.

Fishes, which neither chew their meat, nor grind it in their stomachs, do, by a dissolvent liquor there provided, corrode and reduce it into a chylus. Ray.

The blood turning acrimonious, corrodes the vessels, producing almost all the diseases of the inflammatory kind. Arbuthnot.

Should jealousy its venom once diffuse,
Corroding every thought, and blasting all
Love's paradise. Thomson's Spring.

CORRO'DENT, kŏr-rō'dĕnt. adj. [from corrode.] Having the power of corroding or wasting any thing away.

CORRODIBI'LITY, kŏr-rō-dĕ-bĭl'ĕ-tĕ. n. s. [from corrodible.] The quality of being corrosible; possibility to be consumed by a menstruum.

CORRO'DIBLE, kŏr-rō'dĕ-bl. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed or corroded.

Metals, although corrodible by waters, yet will not suffer a liquation from the powerfullest heat communicable unto that element. Brown.

CO'RRODY, kŏr'rō-dĕ. n. s. [from corrodo, Lat.] A defalcation from an allowance or salary, for some other than the original purpose.

Besides these floating burgesses of the ocean, there are certain flying citizens of the air, which prescribe for a corrody therein. Carew.

In those days even noble persons, and other meaner men, ordered corrodies and pensions to their chaplains and servants out of churches. Ayliffe.

CORRO'SIBLE, kŏr-rō'sĕ-bl. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed by a menstruum. This ought to be corrodible.

CORRO'SIBLENESS, kŏr-rō'sĕ-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from corrosible.] Susceptibility of corrosion: rather corrodibility. Dict.

CORRO'SION, kŏr-rō'zhŭn.[451] n. s. [corrodo, Lat.] The power of eating or wearing away by degrees.

Corrosion is a particular species of dissolution of bodies, either by an acid or a saline menstruum. It is almost wholly designed for the resolution of bodies most strongly compacted, as bones and metals; so that the menstruums here employed have a considerable moment or force. These liquors, whether acid or urinous, are nothing but salts dissolved in a little phlegm; therefore these being solid, and consequently containing a considerable quantity of matter, do both attract one another more, and are also more attracted by the particles of the body to be dissolved: so when the more solid bodies are put into saline menstruums, the attraction is stronger than in other solutions; and the motion, which is always proportional to the attraction, is more violent: so that we may easily conceive, when the motion is in such a manner increased, it should drive the salts into the pores of the bodies, and open and loosen their cohesion, though ever so firm. Quincy.

A kind of poison worketh either by corrosion, or by a secret malignity and enmity to nature. Bacon.

That corrosion and dissolution of bodies, even the most solid and durable, which is vulgarly ascribed to the air, is caused merely by the action of water upon them; the air being so far from injuring and preying upon the bodies it environs, that it contributes to their security and preservation. Woodward.

Corro'sive, kŏr-rō'sĭv.[428] adj. [from corrodo, Lat. It was anciently pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, now indifferently.]

1. Having the power of consuming or wearing away.

Gold, after it has been divided by corrosive liquors into invisible parts, yet may presently be precipitated, so as to appear again in its own form. Grew's Cosmologia.

The sacred sons of vengeance, on whose course Corrosive famine waits, and kills the year. Thomson's Spring.

2. Having the quality to fret or vex.

If the maintenance of ceremonies be a corrosive to such as oppugn them, undoubtedly to such as maintain them it can be no great pleasure, when they behold that which they reverence is oppugned. Hooker.

Corro'sive, kŏr-rō'sĭv.[140] n. s.

1. That which has the quality of wasting any thing away, as the flesh of an ulcer.

He meant his corrosives to apply,
And with strict diet tame his stubborn malady. Fairy Queen.

2. That which has the power of fretting, or of giving pain.

Such speeches savour not of God in him that useth them, and unto virtuously disposed minds they are grievous corrosives. Hooker.

Away! though parting be a fretful corrosive,
It is applied to a deathful wound. Shaksp.

Care is no cure, but rather corrosive,
For things that are not to be remedied. Shaksp.

Corro'sively, kŏr-rō'sĭv-lē. adv. [from corrosive.]

1. Like a corrosive.

At first it tasted somewhat corrosively. Boyle.

2. With the power of corrosion.

Corro'siveness, kŏr-rō'sĭv-nĕs. n. s. [from corrosive.] The quality of corroding or eating away; acrimony.

We do infuse, to what he meant for meat,
Corrosiveness, or intense cold or heat. Donne.

Saltpetre betrays upon the tongue no heat nor corrosiveness at all, but coldness, mixt with a somewhat languid relish retaining to bitterness. Boyle.

Co'rrugant, kŏr'rŭ-gănt.[503] adj. [from corrugate.] Having the power of contracting into wrinkles.

To CO'RRUGATE, kŏr'rŭ-gāte.[91] v. a. [corrugo, Lat.] To wrinkle or purse up, as the skin is drawn into wrinkles by cold, or any other cause. Quincy.

The cramp cometh of contraction of sinews: it cometh either by cold or dryness; for cold and dryness do both of them contract and corrugate. Bacon.

Corruga'tion, kŏr-rŭ-gā'shŭn. n. s. [from corrugate.] Contraction into wrinkles.

The pain of the solid parts is the corrugation or violent agitation of fibres, when the spirits are irritated by sharp humours. Floyer on the Humours.

To CORRU'PT, kŏr-rŭpt'. v. a. [corrumpo, corruptus, Lat.]

1. To turn from a sound to a putrescent state; to infect.

2. To deprave; to destroy integrity; to vitiate; to bribe.

I fear lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. 2 Corinthians, xi. 3.

Evil communications corrupt good manners. 1 Corinthians, xv. 33.

All that have miscarried
By underhand, corrupted, foul injustice. Shaksp.

I have heard it said, the fittest time to corrupt a man's wife, is when she's fallen out with her husband. Shakspeare.

But stay, I smell a man of middle earth;
With trial fire touch me his finger-end;
If he be chaste, the flame will back descend,
And turn him to no pain; but if he start,
It is the flesh of a corrupted heart. Shaksp.

Language being the conduit whereby men convey their knowledge, he that makes an ill use of it, though he does not corrupt the fountains of knowledge, which are in things, yet he stops the pipes. Locke.

Hear the black trumpet thro' the world proclaim,
That not to be corrupted is the shame. Pope.

3. To spoil; to do mischief.

To Corru'pt, kŏr-rŭpt'. v. n. To become putrid; to grow rotten; to putrefy; to lose purity.

The aptness or propension of air or water to corrupt or putrefy, no doubt, is to be found before it break forth into manifest effects of diseases, blasting, or the like. Bacon.

Corru'pt, kŏr-rŭpt'. adj. [from To corrupt.]

1. Spoiled; tainted; vitiated in its qualities

Coarse hoary moulded bread the soldiers thrust upon the points of their spears, railing against Ferdinand, who with such corrupt and pestilent bread would feed them. Knolles.

2. Unsound; putrid.

As superfluous flesh did rot,
Amendment ready still at hand did wait,
To pluck it out, with pincers fiery hot,
That soon in him was left no corrupt jot. Spenser.

3. Vitious; tainted with wickedness; without integrity.

Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying. Ephesians, iv. 29.

Corrupt, corrupt, and tainted in desire. Shaksp.

These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness
Harbour more craft, and more corrupter ends;
Than twenty silky ducking observants. Shaksp.

Some, who have been corrupt in their morals, have yet been infinitely solicitous to have their children piously brought up. South's Sermons.

Corru'pter, kŏr-rŭp'tŭr. n. s. [from corrupt.] He that taints or vitiates; he that lessens purity or integrity.

Away, away, corrupters of my faith! Shaksp.

From the vanity of the Greeks the corrupters of all truth, who without all ground of certainty vaunt their antiquity, came the errour first of all. Raleigh.

Those great corrupters of Christianity, and indeed of natural religion, the Jesuits. Addison.

Corruptibi'lity, kŏr-rŭp-tē'bĭl-ē-tē. n. s. [from corruptible.] Possibility to be corrupted.

Corru'ptible, kŏr-rŭp'tē-bl. adj. [from corrupt.]

1. Susceptible of destruction by natural decay, or without violence.

Our corruptible bodies could never live the life they shall live, were it not that they are joined with his body which is incorruptible, and that his is in ours as a cause of immortality. Hooker.

It is a devouring corruption of the essential mixture, which, consisting chiefly of an oily moisture, is corruptible through dissipation. Harvey.

The several parts of which the world consists being in their nature corruptible, it is more than probable, that, in an infinite duration, this frame of things would long since have been dissolved. Tillotson.

2. Susceptible of external depravation; possible to be tainted or vitiated.

Corru'ptibleness, kŏr-rŭp'tē-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from corruptible.] Susceptibility of corruption.

Corru'ptibly, kŏr-rŭp'tē-blē. adv. [from corruptible.] In such a manner as to be corrupted, or vitiated.

It is too late; the life of all his blood
Is touch'd corruptibly. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Corru'ption, kŏr-rŭp'shŭn. n. s. [corruptio, Lat.]

1. The principle by which bodies tend to the separation of their parts.

2. Wickedness; perversion of principles; loss of integrity.

Precepts of morality, besides the natural corruption of our tempers, which makes us averse to them, are so abstracted from ideas of sense, that they seldom get an opportunity for descriptions and images. Addison on the Georgicks.

Amidst corruption, luxury, and rage,
Still leave some ancient virtues to our age. Pope.

3. Putrescence.

The wise contriver on his end intent,
Careful this fatal errour to prevent,
And keep the waters from corruption free,
Mix'd them with salt, and season'd all the sea. Blackmore.

4. Matter or pus in a sore.

5. The tendency to a worse state.

After my death I wish no other herald,
No other speaker of my living actions,
To keep mine honour from corruption,
But such an honest chronicler as Griffith. Shaksp.

6. Cause, or means, of depravation.

The region hath by conquest and corruption of other languages, received new and differing names. Raleigh's Hist.

All those four kinds of corruption are very common in their language; for which reasons the Greek tongue is become much altered. Brerewood.

7. [In law.] An infection growing to a man attainted of felony, or treason, and to his issue; for as he loseth all to the prince, or other lord of the fee, so his issue cannot be heir to him, or to any other ancestor, of whom they might have claimed by him; and if he were noble, or a gentleman, he and his children are made ignoble and ungentle, in respect of the father. Cowell.

Corru'ptive, kŏr-rŭp'tĭv. adj. [from corrupt.] Having the quality of tainting or vitiating.

Carrying a settled habitude into the corruptive originals. Brown's Vul. Err.

It should be endued with an acid ferment, or some corruptive quality, for so speedy a dissolution of the meat and preparation of the chyle. Ray.

Corru'ptless, kŏr-rŭpt'lĕs. adj. [from corrupt.] Insusceptible of corruption; undecaying.

All around
The borders with corruptless myrrh are crown'd. Dryden

CORRU'PTLY, kŏr-rŭpt'lė. adv. [from corrupt.]

1. With corruption; with taint; with vice; without integrity.

O that estates, degrees, and offices,
Were not deriv'd corruptly! that clear honour
Were purchas'd by the merit of the wearer. Shak.

We have dealt very corruptly against thee, and have not kept thy commandments. Nehemiah, i. 7.

2. Vitiously; improperly; contrary to purity.

We have corruptly contracted most names, both of men and places. Camden's Remains.

For he was strong, and of so mighty corse,
As ever wielded spear in warlike hand. Spenser.

2. A dead body; a carcase; a poetical word.

That from her body full of filthy sin,
He reft her hateful head, without remorse;
A stream of coal-black blood forth gushed from her corse. Spenser.

Set down the corse; or, by saint Paul,
I'll make a corse of him that disobeys. Shaksp.

What may this mean?
That thou, dead corse, again in complete steel
Revisit'st thus the glimpses of the moon,
Making night hideous? Shaksp. Hamlet.

Here lay him down, my friends,
Full in my sight, that I may view at leisure
The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds. Addison.

CO'RSELET, kŏrs'lêt. n. s. [corselet, Fr.] A light armour for the forepart of the body.

Some shirts of maile, some coats of plate put on,
Some don'd a cuirace, some a corslet bright. Fairf.

They lash, they foin, they pass, they strive to bore
Their corslets, and their thinnest parts explore. Dryden.

But heroes, who o'ercome or die,
Have their hearts hung extremely high;
The strings of which, in battle's heat,
Against their very corselets beat. Prior.

CO'RTICAL, kŏr'tė-kâl. adj. [cortex, bark, Lat.] Barky; belonging to the outer part; belonging to the rind; outward.

Their last extremities form a little gland (all these little glands together make the cortical part of the brain), terminating in two little vessels. Cheyne.

COSME'TICK, kŏz-mĕt'ĭk. adj. [κοσμητικὸς.] Having the power of improving beauty; beautifying.

No better cosmeticks than a severe temperance and purity, modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit; no true beauty without the signatures of these graces in the very countenance. Ray on the Creation.

First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores,
With head uncover'd, the cosmetick pow'rs. Pope.

CO'SMICAL, kŏz'mė-kâl. adj. [κόσμος.]

1. Relating to the world.

2. Rising or setting with the sun; not acronycal.

The cosmical ascension of a star we term that, when it ariseth together with the sun, or in the same degree of the ecliptick wherein the sun abideth. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

CO'SMICALLY, kŏz'mė-kâl-ė. adv. [from cosmical.] With the sun; not acronycally.

From the rising of this star, not cosmically, that is, with the sun, but heliacally, that is, its emersion from the rays of the sun, the ancients computed their canicular days. Brown.

COSMO'GONY, kŏz-mŏg'gō-nė.[518] n. s. [κόσμος and γονη.] The rise or birth of the world; the creation.

COSMO'GRAPHER, kŏz-mŏg'grâ-fŭr.[518] n. s. [κόσμος and γραφω.] One who writes a description of the world; distinct from geographer, who describes the situation of particular countries.

The ancient cosmographers do place the division of the east and western hemisphere, that is, the first term of longitude, in the Canary or Fortunate Islands, conceiving these parts the extremest habitations westward. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

COSMOGRA'PHICAL, kŏz-mō-grâf'ė-kâl.[509] adj. [from cosmography.] Relating to the general description of the world.

COSMOGRA'PHICALLY, kŏz-mō-grâf'ė-kâl-ė. adv. [from cosmographical.] In a manner relating to the science by which the structure of the world is discovered and described.

The terrella, or spherical magnet, cosmographically set out with circles of the globe. Brown's Vulg. Err.

COSMO'GRAPHY, kŏz-mŏg'grâ-fė.[518] n. s. [κόσμος and γράφω.] The science of the general system or affections of the world; distinct from geography, which delivers the situation and boundaries of particular countries.

Here it might see the world without travel; it being a lesser scheme of the creation, nature contracted, a little cosmography or map of the universe. South.

COSMOPO'LITAN, kŏz-mō-pŏl'ė-tân.
COSMO'POLITE, kŏz-mŏp'ō-lite.[156] } n. s. [κόσμος and πολίτης.] A citizen of the world; one who is at home in every place.

CO'SSET, kŏs'sĭt. n. s. A lamb brought up without the dam.

If thou wilt bewail my woeful teen,
I shall thee give yond' cosset for thy pain. Spenser.

COST, kŏst. n. s. [kost, Dut. As this word is found in the remotest Teutonick dialects, even in the Islandick, it is not probably derived to us from the Latin consto; though it is not unlikely that the French couster comes from the Latin.]

1. The price of any thing.

2. Sumptuousness; luxury.

The city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders. Shaksp.

Let foreign princes vainly boast
The rude effects of pride and cost
Of vaster fabrics, to which they Contribute nothing but the pay. Waller.

3. Charge; expense.

While he found his daughter maintained without his cost, he was content to be deaf to any noise of infamy. Sidney.

I shall never hold that man my friend,
Whose tongue shall ask me for one penny cost,
To ransom home revolted Mortimer. Shaksp.

Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift? 2 Sam. xix. 42.

And wilt thou, O cruel boast!
Put poor nature to such cost?
O! 'twill undo our common mother,
To be at charge of such another. Crashaw.

It is strange to see any ecclesiastical pile, not by ecclesiastical cost and influence, rising above ground; especially in an age in which men's mouths are open against the church, but their hands shut towards it. South's Sermons.

He whose tale is best, and pleases most,
Should win his supper at our common cost. Dryd.

Fourteen thousand pounds are paid by Wood for the purchase of his patent: what were his other visible costs, I know not; what his latent, is variously conjectured. Swift.

4. Loss; fine; detriment.

What they had fondly wished, proved afterwards to their costs over true. Knolles's Hist.

To Cost, kôst. v. n. pret. cost; particip. cost. [couster, Fr.] To be bought for; to be had at a price.

The dagger and poison are always in readiness; but to bring the action to extremity, and then recover all, will require the art of a writer, and cost him many a pang. Dryden.

Co'stal, kôs'tâl. adj. [costa, Lat. a rib.] Belonging to the ribs.

Hereby are excluded all cetaceous and cartilaginous fishes; many pectinal, whose ribs are rectilineal; and many costal, which have their ribs embowed. Brown.

Co'stard, kôs'târd. n. s. [from coster, a head.]

1. A head.

Take him over the costard with the belt of thy sword. Shakspeare.

2. An apple round and bulky like the head.

Many country vicars are driven to shifts; and if our greedy patrons hold us to such conditions, they will make us turn costard mongers, grasiers, or sell ale. Burton on Melancholy.

CO'STIVE, kôs'tîv.[167] adj. [constipatus, Lat. constipé, Fr.]

1. Bound in the body; having the excretions obstructed.

When the passage of the gall becomes obstructed, the body grows costive, and the excrements of the belly white. Brown.

While faster than his costive brain indites,
Philo's quick hand in flowing letters writes;
His case appears to me like honest Teague's,
When he was run away with by his legs. Prior.

2. Close; unpermeable.

Clay in dry seasons is costive, hardening with the sun and wind, till unlocked by industry, so as to admit of the air and heavenly influences. Mortimer.

Co'stiveness, kôs'tîv-nês. n. s. [from costive.] The state of the body in which excretion is obstructed.

Costiveness disperses malign putrid fumes out of the guts and mesentery into all parts of the body, occasioning head-aches, fevers, loss of appetite, and disturbance of concoction. Harvey.

Costiveness has ill effects, and is hard to be dealt with by physick; purging medicines rather increasing than removing the evil. Locke.

Co'stliness, kôst'lê-nês. n. s. [from costly.] Sumptuousness; expensiveness.

Though not with curious costliness, yet with cleanly sufficiency, it entertained me. Sidney.

Nor have the frugaller sons of fortune any reason to object the costliness; since they frequently pay dearer for less advantageous pleasures. Glanville.

Co'stly, kôst'lê. adj. [from cost.] Sumptuous; expensive; of a high price.

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not exprest in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man. Shaksp.

Leave for a while thy costly country-seat;
And, to be great indeed, forget
The nauseous pleasures of the great. Dryden.

The chapel of St. Laurence will be perhaps the most costly piece of work on the earth, when completed. Addison.

He is here speaking of Paradise, which he represents as a most charming and delightful place; abounding with things not only useful and convenient, but even the most rare and valuable, the most costly and desirable. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

Co'stmary, kôst'mâ-rê. n. s. [costus, Lat.] An herb.

Co'strel, kôs'trêl. n. s. [supposed to be derived from coster.] A bottle. Skin.

Cot, kôt. }
Cote, kôte. } At the end of the names of places, come generally
Coat, kôte. } from the Saxon cot, a cottage. Gibson.

COT, kôt. n. s. [cot, Sax. cwt, Welsh.] A small house; a cottage; a hut; a mean habitation.

What that usage meant,
Which in her cot she daily practised. Fairy Queen.

Besides, his cot, his flock, and bounds of feed,
Are now on sale; and at our sheep cot now,
By reason of his absence, there is nothing
That you will feed on. Shakspeare.

Hezekiah made himself stalls for all manner of beasts, and cots for flocks. 2 Chron. xxxii. 28.

A stately temple shoots within the skies;
The crotchets of their cot in columns rise;
The pavement, polish'd marble they behold;
The gates with sculpture grac'd, the spires and tiles of gold. Dryden.

As Jove vouchsaf'd on Ida's top, 'tis said,
At poor Philemon's cot to take a bed. Fenton.

Cot, kôt. n. s. An abridgment of cotquean.

Cota'ngent, kô-tân'jênt. n. s. [In geometry.] The tangent of an arch which is the complement of another to ninety degrees. Harris.

To Cote, kôte. v. a. This word, which I have found only in Chapman, seems to signify the same as To leave behind, To overpass.

Words her worth had prov'd with deeds,
Had more ground been allow'd the race, and coted far his steeds. Chapman's Iliad.

Cote'mporary, kô-têm'pô-râ-rê. adj. [con and tempus, Lat.] Living at the same time; coetaneous; contemporary.

What would not, to a rational man, cotemporary with the first voucher, have appeared probable, is now used as certain, because several have since, from him, said it one after another. Locke.

Co'tland, kôt'lând. n. s. [cot and land.] Land appendant to a cottage.

Co'tquean, kôt'kwêne. n. s. [probably from coquin, Fr.] A man who busies himself with women's affairs.

Look to the bak'd meats, good Angelica;
Spare not for cost.——
——Go, go, you cotquean, go;
Get you to bed. Shak. Romeo and Juliet.

A stateswoman is as ridiculous a creature as a cotquean: each of the sexes should keep within its bounds. Addison.

You have given us a lively picture of husbands hen-peck'd; but you have never touched upon one of the quite different character, and who goes by the name of cotquean. Addison.

Co'ttage, kôt'tâge.[90] n. s. [from cot.] A hut; a mean habitation; a cot; a little house.

The sea coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks. Zeph. ii. 6.

They were right glad to take some corner of a poor cottage, and there to serve God upon their knees. Hooker.

The self-same sun that shines upon his court,
Hides not his visage from our cottage, but Looks on both alike. Shaksp. Winter's Tale.

Let the women of noble birth and great fortunes nurse their children, look to the affairs of the house, visit poor cottages, and relieve their necessities. Taylor's Holy Living.

It is difficult for a peasant, bred up in the obscurities of a cottage, to fancy in his mind the splendors of a court. South.

Beneath our humble cottage let us haste,
And here, unenvied, rural dainties taste. Pope.

Co'ttager, kôt'tâ-jûr. n. s. [from cottage.]

1. One who lives in a hut or cottage.

Let us from our farms
Call forth our cottagers to arms. Swift.

The most ignorant Irish cottager will not sell his cow for a groat. Swift's Address to Parliament.

2. A cottager, in law, is one that lives on the common, without paying rent, and without any land of his own.

The husbandmen and plowmen be but as their work-folks and labourers; or else mere cottagers, which are but housed beggars. Bacon.

The yeomenry, or middle people, of a condition between gentlemen and cottagers. Bacon.

Co'ttier, kôt'yêr.[113] n. s. [from cot.] One who inhabits a cot. Dict.

CO'TTON, kôt'tn.[170] n. s. [named, according to Skinner, from the down that adheres to the mala cotonea, or quince, called by the Italians cotogni; whence cottone, Ital. cotton, Fr.]

1. The down of the cotton-tree.

The pin ought to be as thick as a rowling-pin, and covered with cotton, that its hardness may not be offensive. Wiseman.

2. Cloth made of cotton.

Co'tton, kôt'tn. n. s. A plant.

The species are, 1. Shrubby cotton. 2. The most excellent American cotton, with a greenish seed. 3. Annual shrubby cotton, of the island of Providence. 4. The tree cotton. 5. Tree cotton, with a yellow flower. The first sort is cultivated plentifully in Candia, Lemnos, Cyprus, Malta, Sicily, and at Naples; as also between Jerusalem and Damascus, from whence the cotton is brought annually into these northern parts of Europe. The cotton is the wool which incloses or wraps up the seeds, and is contained in a kind of brown husk, or seed-vessel, growing upon this shrub. It is from this sort that the vast quantities of cotton are taken, which furnish our parts of the world. The second and third sorts are annual: these are cultivated in the West Indies in great plenty. But the fourth and fifth sorts grow in Egypt: these abide many years, and often arrive to be trees of great magnitude. Miller.

To Co'tton, kôt'tn. v. n.

1. To rise with a knap.

2. To cement; to unite with; a cant word.

A quarrel will end in one of you being turned off, in which case it will not be easy to cotton with another. Swift.

To COUCH, kôûtsh.[313] v. n. [coucher, Fr.]

1. To lie down on a place of repose.

If I court more women, you'll couch with more men. Shaksp.

Doth not the gentleman
Deserve as full, as fortunate a bed,
As ever Beatrice shall couch upon? Shaksp.

When love's fair goddess

2. To lie down on the knees, as a beast to rest.

Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs,
Fierce tygers couch'd around, and loll'd their fawning tongues. Dryden's Virgil.

These, when death
Comes like a rushing lion, couch like spaniels,
With lolling tongues, and tremble at the paw. Dryd.

3. To lie down in secret, or in ambush.

We'll couch i' th' castle-ditch, till we see the light of our fairies. Shakspeare.

The earl of Angus couched in a furrow, and was passed over for dead, until a horse was brought for his escape. Hayward.

4. To lie in a bed, or stratum.

Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath. Deut.

5. To stoop or bend down; to lower in fear, in pain, in respect.

These couchings, and these lowly courtesies,
Might stir the blood of ordinary men. Shakspeare.

Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens. Genesis, xlix. 14.

To COUCH, kǒǔtsh. v. a.

1. To repose; to lay on a place of repose.

Where unbruis'd youth, with unstuff'd brain,
Doth couch his limbs, there golden sleep doth reign. Shakspeare.

2. To lay down any thing in a bed, or stratum.

If the weather be warm, we immediately couch malt about a foot thick; but if a hotter season require it, we spread it on the floor much thinner Mortimer's Husbandry.

The sea and the land make one globe; and the waters couch themselves, as close as may be, to the centre of this globe, in a spherical convexity. Burnet's Theory of the Earth.

3. To bed; to hide in another body.

It is at this day in use at Gaza, to couch potsherds, or vessels of earth, in their walls, to gather the wind from the top, and to pass it down in spouts into rooms. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

4. To involve; to include; to comprise.

But who will call those noble, who deface,
By meaner acts, the glories of their race;
Whose only title to their father's fame
Is couch'd in the dead letters of their name? Dryd.

That great argument for a future state, which St. Paul hath couched in the words I have read to you. Atterbury's Sermons.

5. To include secretly; to hide: with under.

The foundation of all parables, is some analogy or similitude between the topical or allusive part of the parable, and the thing couched under it, and intended by it. South.

There is all this, and more, that lies naturally couched under this allegory. L'Estrange.

The true notion of the institution being lost, the tradition of the deluge, which was couched under it, was thereupon at length suspended and lost. Woodward.

6. To lay close to another.

And over all with brazen scales was arm'd,
Like plated coat of steel, so couched near,
That nought might pierce. Spenser.

7. To fix the spear in the rest, in the posture of attack.

The knight 'gan fairly couch his steady spear,
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might. Spenser.

Before each van
Prick forth the aery knights, and couch their spears,
Till thickest legions close. Milton's Par. Lost.

The former way'd in air
His flaming sword; Æneas couched his spear. Dryden's Æneid.

8. To depress the condensed crystalline humour or film that overspreads the pupil of the eye. This is improperly called couching the eye, for couching the cataract: with equal impropriety they sometimes speak of couching the patient.

Some artist, whose nice hand
Couches the cataracts, and clears his sight,
And all at once a flood of glorious light
Comes rushing on his eyes. Dennis.

Whether the cataract be wasted by being separated from its vessels, I have never known positively, by dissecting one that had been couched. Sharp.

COUCH, kǒǔtsh. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A seat of repose, on which it is common to lie down dressed.

So Satan fell; and straight a fiery globe
Of angels on full sail of wing flew nigh,
Who on their plumy vans receiv'd him soft
From his uneasy station, and upbore,
As on a floating couch, through the blithe air. Milton's Par. Regained.

To loll on couches rich with citron steds,
And lay their guilty limbs in Tyrian beds. Dryden's Virgil's Georgics.

O ye immortal pow'rs, that guard the just,
Watch round his couch, and soften his repose! Addison's Cato.

2. A bed; a place of repose.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury and damned incest. Shaksp.

Dire was the tossing, deep the groans! despair
Tended the sick, busiest from couch to couch. Milt.

This gentle knight, inspir'd by jolly May,
Forsook his early couch at early day. Dryd. Fables.

3. A layer, or stratum.

This heap is called by maltsters a couch, or bed, of raw malt. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CO'UCHANT, kǒǔtsh'ânt. adj. [couchant, Fr.] Lying down; squatting.

If a lion were the coat of Judah, yet were it not probably a lion rampant, but rather couchant or dormant. Brown.

As a tiger, who by chance hath spy'd,
In some purlieu, two gentle fawns at play,
Straight couches close; then rising, changes oft
His couchant watch. Milton's Par. Lost.

CO'UCHEE, kǒǒ'shèè. n. s. [Fr.] Bedtime; the time of visiting late at night.

None of her sylvan subjects made their court;
Levees and couchees pass'd without resort. Dryden.

CO'UCHER, kǒǔtsh'ůr. n. s. [from couch.] He that couches or depresses cataracts.

CO'UCHFELLOW, kǒǔtsh'fĕl-lō. n. s. [couch and fellow.] Bedfellow; companion.

I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, and your couchfellow, Nim; or else you had looked through the grate like a geminy of baboons. Shaksp.

CO'UCHGRASS, kǒǔtsh'grâs. n. s. A weed.

The couchgrass, for the first year, insensibly robs most plants in sandy grounds apt to graze. Mortimer's Husbandry.

COVE, kōve. n. s.

1. A small creek or bay.

CO'VENANT, kův'ĕ-nânt.[165] [503] n. s. [covenant, Fr. conventum, Lat.]

1. A contract; a stipulation.

He makes a covenant never to destroy
The earth again by flood; nor let the sea
Surpass his bounds. Milton's Par. Lost.

The English make the ocean their abode,
Whose ready sails with ev'ry wind can fly,
And make a cov'nant with th' inconstant sky. Waller.

Some men live as if they had made a covenant with hell: let divines, fathers, friends, say what they will, they stop their ears against them. L'Estrange.

2. An agreement on certain terms; a compact.

A covenant is a mutual compact, as we now consider it, betwixt God and man; consisting of mercies, on God's part, made over to man; and of conditions, on man's part, required by God. Hammond's Practical Catechism.

3. A writing containing the terms of agreement.

I shall but lend my diamond till your return; let there be covenants drawn between us. Shaksp.

To CO'VENANT, kův'ĕ-nânt. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To bargain; to stipulate.

His lord used commonly so to covenant with him, which if at any time the tenant disliked, he might freely depart at his pleasure. Spenser's State of Ireland.

It had been covenanted between him and the king of England that neither of them should treat of peace or truce with the French king. Hayward on Edward VI.

By words men come to know one another's minds; by these they covenant and confederate. South.

Jupiter covenanted with him, that it should be hot or cold, wet or dry, calm or windy, as the tenant should direct. L'Estrange.

2. To agree with another on certain terms: with for before either the price or the thing purchased.

They covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. Matthew.

Pointing to a heap of sand,
For ev'ry grain, to live a year demand;
But, ah! unmindful of th' effect of time,
Forgot to covenant for youth and prime. Garth's Ovid.

COVENANTE'E, kův'ĕ-nân-tèè'. n. s. [from covenant.] A party to a covenant; a stipulator; a bargainer.

Both of them were respective rites of their admission into the several covenants, and the covenantees become thereby entitled to the respective privileges. Ayliffe's Parergon.

COVENA'NTER, kův'ĕ-nân-tůr. n. s. [from covenant.] One who takes a covenant. A word introduced in the civil wars.

The covenanters shall have no more assurance of mutual assistance each from other, after the taking of the covenant, than they had before. Oxford Reasons against the Covenant.

COVENOUS, kův'ĕn-ůs. adj. [from covin.] Fraudulent; collusive; trickish.

I wish some means devised for the restraint of these inordinate and covenous leases of lands, holden in chief, for hundreds or thousands of years. Bacon's Office of Alienation.

To CO'VER, kův'ůr.[165] v. a. [couvrir, Fr.]

1. To overspread any thing with something else.

In Dothan cover'd with a camp of fire. Milton.

Go to thy fellows, bid them cover the table, serve in the meat, and we will come in to dinner. Shaksp. Merchant of Venice.

2. To conceal under something laid over.

Nor he their outward only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness, much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness
Arraying, cover'd from his father's sight. Milton.

Cover me, ye pines!
Ye cedars with innumerable boughs
Hide me, that I may never see them more. Milt.

In life's cool vale let my low scene be laid,
Cover me, gods, with Tempe's thickest shade. Cowley.

Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race. Dryden's Virgil.

3. To hide by superficial appearances.

4. To overwhelm; to bury.

Raillery and wit serve only to cover nonsense with shame, when reason has first proved it to be mere nonsense. Watts.

5. To conceal from notice or punishment.

Charity shall cover the multitude of sins. 1 Peter, iv.

Thou may'st repent,
And one bad act with many deeds well done

6. To shelter; to protect.

His calm and blameless life
Does with substantial blessedness abound,
And the soft wings of peace cover him round.
Cowley.

7. To incubate; to brood on.

Natural historians observe, that only the male birds have voices; that their songs begin a little before breeding time, and end a little after; that, whilst the hen is covering her eggs, the male generally takes his stand upon a neighbouring bough within her hearing, and by that means amuses and diverts her with his songs during the whole time of her sitting. Addison's Spectator.

8. To copulate with a female.

9. To wear the hat, or garment of the head, as a mark of superiority or independence.

That king had conferred the honour of grandee upon him, which was of no other advantage or signification to him, than to be covered in the presence of that king. Dryden.

Co'VER, kův'ůr.[98] n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Any thing that is laid over another.

The secundine is but a general cover, not shaped according to the parts; the skin is shaped according to the parts. Bacon.

The fountains could be strengthened no other way than by making a strong cover, or arch over them. Burnet's Theory.

Orestes' bulky rage,
Unsatisfied with margins closely writ,
Foams o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.
Dryden's Juvenal.

With your hand, or any other cover, you stop the vessel so as wholly to exclude the air. Ray.

2. A concealment; a screen; a veil; a superficial appearance, under which something is hidden.

The truth and reason of things may be artificially and effectually insinuated, under the cover either of a real fact or of a supposed one. L'Estr.

As the spleen has great inconveniencies, so the pretence of it is a handsome cover for imperfections. Collier on the Spleen.

3. Shelter; defence from weather.

In the mean time, by being compelled to lodge in the fields, which grew now to be very cold, whilst his army was under cover, they might be forced to retire. Clarendon.

Cover-shame, kův'ůr-shâme. n. s. [cover and shame.] Some appearance used to conceal infamy.

Does he put on holy garments for a cover-shame of lewdness? Dryden's Spanish Friar.

Co'vering, kův'ůr-ĭng. n. s. [from cover.] Dress; vesture; any thing spread over another.

The women took and spread a covering over the well's mouth. 2 Sam. xvii. 19.

Bring some covering for this naked soul,
Whom I'll intreat to lead me. Shak. King Lear.

Through her flesh methinks is seen
The brighter soul that dwells within;
Our eyes the subtle covering pass,
And see the lily through its glass. Cowley.

Then from the floor he rais'd a royal bed,
With cov'rings of Sidonian purple spread. Dryden.

Sometimes Providence casts things so, that truth and interest lie the same way; and when it is wrapt up in this covering, men can be content to follow it. South.

Co'verlet, kův'ůr-lĕt.[99] n. s. [couvrelict, Fr.] The outermost of the bedclothes; that under which all the rest are concealed.

Lay her in lilies and in violets,
And silken curtains over her display,
And odour'd sheets, and arras coverlets. Spenser.

This done, the host produc'd the genial bed,
Which with no costly coverlet they spread. Dryd.

I was, for want of a house and bed, forced to lie on the ground, wrapt up in my coverlet. Swift.

Co'vert, kův'ůrt.[98] n. s. [from cover; couvert, Fr.]

1. A shelter; a defence.

Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler. Isaiah, xvi. 4.

There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the day-time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and rain. Isaiah, iv. 6.

They are by sudden alarm, or watch-word, to be called out to their military motions, under sky or covert, according to the season, as was the Roman wont. Milton on Education.

It was the hour of night, when thus the Son
Commun'd in silent walk, then laid him down
Under the hospitable covert nigh
Of trees thick interwoven. Milton.

Now have a care your carnations catch not too much wet, therefore retire them to covert. Evelyn's Kalendar.

2. A thicket, or hiding place.

Tow'rds him I made; but he was 'ware of me,
And stole into the covert of the wood. Shaksp.

I shall be your faithful guide,
Through this gloomy covert wide. Milton.

Thence to the coverts, and the conscious groves,
The scenes of his past triumphs and his loves.
Denham.

Deep into some thick covert would I run,
Impenetrable to the stars or sun. Dryden.

The deer is lodg'd; I've track'd her to her covert:
Be sure ye mind the word: and when I give it,
Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey.
Addison's Cato.

Co'vert, kův'ůrt. adj. [couvert, Fr.]

1. Sheltered; not open; not exposed.

You are, of either side the green, to plant a covert alley, upon carpenter's work, about twelve foot in height, by which you may go in shade into the garden. Bacon.

The fox is a beast also very prejudicial to the husbandman, especially in places that are nearer forest-woods and covert places. Mortimer.

Together let us beat this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert yield. Pope.

2. Secret; hidden; private; insidious.

And let us presently go sit in council,
How covert matters may be best disclos'd,
And open perils surest answered. Shaksp.

By what best way,
Whether of open war, or covert guile,
We now debate. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Co'vert, kův'ůrt. adj. [couvert, Fr.] The state of a woman sheltered by marriage under her husband; as covert baron, feme covert.

Instead of her being under covert baron, to be under covert feme myself! to have my body disabled, and my head fortified! Dryd. Spanish Friar.

Covert-way, kův'ůrt-wâ'. n. s. [from covert and way.]

It is, in fortification, a space of ground level with the field, on the edge of the ditch, three or four fathom broad, ranging quite round the half moons, or other works toward the country. One of the greatest difficulties in a siege is to make a lodgment on the covert-way, because usually the besieged pallisade it along the middle, and undermine it on all sides. It is sometimes called the corridor, and sometimes the counterscarp, because it is on the edge of the scarp. Harris.

Co'vertly, kův'ůrt-lė. adv. [from covert.] Secretly; closely; in private; with privacy.

Yet still Aragnol (so his foe was hight)
Lay lurking, covertly him to surprise. Spenser.

How can'st thou cross this marriage?——
—Not honestly, my lord; but so covertly, that no dishonesty shall appear in me. Shaksp.

Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero; some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. Dryden.

Co'vertness, kův'ůrt-nĕs. n. s. [from covert.] Secrecy; privacy. Dict.

Co'verture, kův'ůr-tůre. n. s. [from covert.]

1. Shelter; defence; not exposure.

It may be it is rather the shade, or other coverture, that they take liking in, than the virtue of the herb. Bacon's Natural History.

He saw their shame, that sought
Vain covertures. Milton's Par. Lost.

The winds being so fierce, and so severe, as not to suffer any thing to thrive beyond the height of a shrub, in those islands, unless protected by walls, or other like coverture. Woodward.

2. [In law.] The estate and condition of a married woman, who, by the laws of our realm, is in potestate viri, and therefore disabled to contract with any, to the prejudice of herself or her husband, without his allowance or confirmation. Cowell.

The infancy of king Edward VI. and the coverture of queen Mary, did, in fact, disable them to accomplish the conquest of Ireland. Davies.

To Co'vet, kův'ĕt.[99] v. a. [convoiter, French.]

1. To desire inordinately; to desire beyond due bounds.

If it be a sin to covet honour,
I am the most offending man alive. Shaksp.

I am yet
Unknown to woman; never was forsworn;
Scarcely have coveted what was mine own;
At no time broke my faith. Shaksp. Macbeth.

O father! can it be, that souls sublime
Return to visit our terrestrial clime?
And that the gen'rous mind, releas'd by death,
Can covet lazy limbs and mortal breath?
Dryden's Æneid.

2. To desire earnestly.

All things coveting as much as may be to be like unto God in being ever; that which cannot hereunto attain personally, doth seek to continue itself another way, by offspring and propagation. Hooker.

But covet earnestly the best gifts. 1 Cor. xii. 31.

To Co'vet, kův'ĕt. v. n. To have a strong desire.

The love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith. 1 Tim. vi.

Co'vetable, kův'ĕt-â-bl. adj. [from covet.] To be wished for; to be coveted. Dict.

Co'vetise, kův'ė-tize. n. s. [convoitise, Fr.] Avarice; covetousness of money. Not in use.

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice,
Whose greedy lust did lack in greatest store;
Whose need had end, but no end covetise. Fairy Q.

Co'vetous, kův'ė-tůs. adj. [convoiteux, Fr.]

1. Inordinately desirous; eager.

While cumber'd with my dropping cloaths I lay,
The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
Stain'd with my blood th' unhospitable coast.
Dryden's Æneid.

2. Inordinately eager of money; avaricious.

An heart they have exercised with covetous practices. 2 Peter, ii. 14.

What he cannot help in his nature, you must not account a vice in him: you must in no ways say he is covetous. Shaksp.

Let never so much probability hang on one side of a covetous man's reasoning, and money on the other, it is easy to foresee which will outweigh. Locke.

3. Desirous; eager: in a good sense.

Sheba was never
More covetous of wisdom and fair virtue,
Than this fair soul shall be. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

He that is envious or angry at a virtue that is not his own, at the perfection or excellency of his neighbour, is not covetous of the virtue, but of its reward and reputation, and then his intentions are polluted. Taylor's Rule of Living Holy.

Co'VETOUSLY, kŭv'vĕ-tŭs-lĕ. adv. [from covetous.] Avariciously; eagerly.

If he care not for't, he will supply us easily; if he covetously reserve it, how shall's get it? Shaksp.

Co'VETOUSNESS, kŭv'vĕ-tŭs-nĕs. n. s. [from covetous.]

1. Avarice; inordinate desire of money; eagerness of gain,

He that takes pains to serve the ends of covetousness, or ministers to another's lust, or keeps a shop of impurities or intemperance, is idle in the worst sense. Taylor.

Covetousness debaseth a man's spirit, and sinks it into the earth. Tillotson.

2. Eagerness; desire: in a neutral sense.

When workmen strive to do better than well,
They do confound their skill in covetousness.
Shaksp. King John.

Co'VEY, kŭv'vĕ.[165] n. s. [couvée, Fr.]

1. A hatch; an old bird with her young ones.

2. A number of birds together.

A flight of wasps and covey of partridges went to a farmer, and begged a sup of him to quench their thirst. L'Estrange.

A covey of partridges springing in our front, put our infantry in disorder. Addison's Freeholder.

There would be no walking in a shady wood, without springing a covey of toasts. Addison.

COUGH, kŏf.[321] n. s. [kuch, Dut.] A convulsion of the lungs, vellicated by some sharp serosity.

In consumptions of the lungs, when nature cannot expel the cough, men fall into fluxes of the belly, and then they die. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

For his dear sake long restless nights you bore,
While rattling coughs his heaving vessels tore.
Smith.

To COUGH, kŏf. v. n. [kuchen, Dut.] To have the lungs convulsed; to make a noise in endeavouring to evacuate the peccant matter from the lungs.

Thou didst drink
The stale of horses, and the gilded puddle
Which beasts would cough at. Shaksp.

Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun. Shaksp.

The first problem enquireth why a man doth cough, but not an ox or cow; whereas the contrary is often observed. Brown.

If any humour be discharged upon the lungs, they have a faculty of casting it up by coughing. Ray.

I cough like Horace, and tho' lean, am short.
Pope's Epistles.

To COUGH, kŏf.[391] v. a. To eject by a cough; to expectorate.

If the matter be to be discharged by expectoration, it must first pass into the substance of the lungs; then into the aspera arteria, or weasand; and from thence be coughed up, and spit out by the mouth. Wiseman's Surgery.

Co'UGHER, kŏf'fŭr.[98] n. s. [from cough.] One who coughs. Dict.

Co'VIN, Co'VINE, kŭv'ĭn. n. s. A deceitful agreement between two or more, to the hurt of another. Cowell.

Co'VING, kŏ'vĭng. n. s. [from cove.] A term in building, used of houses that project over the ground-plot, and the turned projecture arched with timber, lathed and plastered. Harris.

COULD, kŭd.[320] [the imperfect preterite of can. See CAN.] Was able to; had power to.

And if I have done well, and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto. 2 Mac. xv. 38.

What if he did not all the ill he could?
Am I oblig'd by that t' assist his rapines,
And to maintain his murders? Dryden's Span. F.

Co'ULTER, kōle'tŭr.[318] n. s. [culter, Lat.] The sharp iron of the plough, which cuts the earth perpendicular to the share.

The Israelites went down to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his ax, and his mattock. 1 Samuel, xiii. 20.

Literature is the grind-stone to sharpen the coulters, to whet their natural faculties. Hammond.

The plough for stiff clay is long and broad; and the coulter long, and very little bending; with a very large wing. Mortimer.

COU'NCIL, kŏŭn'sĭl.[313] n. s. [concilium, Lat.]

1. An assembly of persons met together in consultation.

The chief priests, and all the council, sought false witness. Matthew, xxvi. 59.

The Stygian council thus dissolv'd; and forth
In order came the grand infernal peers. Milton.

In histories composed by politicians, they are for drawing up a perpetual scheme of causes and events, and preserving a constant correspondence between the camp and the council table. Addison.

2. Act of publick deliberation.

The scepter'd heralds call
To council in the city gates: anon
Grey-headed men and grave, with warriors mix'd,
Assemble, and harangues are heard. Milton.

3. An assembly of divines to deliberate upon religion.

Some borrow all their religion from the fathers of the Christian church, or from their synods or councils. Watts.

4. Persons called together to be consulted on any occasion, or to give advice.

They being thus assembled, are more properly a council to the king, the great council of the kingdom, to advise his majesty in those things of weight and difficulty, which concern both the king and people, than a court. Bacon.

5. The body of privy counsellors.

Without the knowledge
Either of king or council, you made bold
To carry into Flanders the great seal. Shaksp.

COUNCIL-BOARD, kŏŭn'sĭl-bōrd. n. s. [council and board.] Council-table; table where matters of state are deliberated.

He hath commanded,
To-morrow morning to the council-board
He be convened. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

When ship-money was transacted at the council-board, they looked upon it as a work of that power they were obliged to trust. Clarendon.

And Pallas, if she broke the laws,
Must yield her foe the stronger cause;
A shame to one so much ador'd
For wisdom at Jove's council-board. Swift.

COU'NSEL, kŏŭn'sĕl.[99] n. s. [consilium, Lat.]

1. Advice; direction.

There is as much difference between the council that a friend giveth, and that a man giveth himself, as there is between the counsel of a friend and of a flatterer. Bacon.

The best counsel he could give him was, to go to his parliament. Clarendon.

Bereave me not,
Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy council, in this uttermost distress. Milton.

2. Consultation; interchange of opinions.

I hold as little counsel with weak fear
As you, or any Scot that lives. Shak. Henry IV.

3. Deliberation; examination of consequences.

They all confess, therefore, in the working of that first cause, that counsel is used, reason followed, and a way observed. Hooker.

4. Prudence; art; machination.

O how comely is the wisdom of old men, and understanding and counsel to men of honour. Ecclus. xxv. 5.

There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel, against the lord. Prov. xxi. 30.

5. Secrecy; the secrets entrusted in consulting.

The players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all. Shaksp.

6. Scheme; purpose; design. Not in use.

The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations. Psalms.

O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed. Com. Pray.

7. Those that plead a cause; the counsellors. This seems only an abbreviature usual in conversation.

Your hand, a covenant; we will have these things set down by lawful counsel. Shak. Cymbeline.

For the advocates and counsel that plead, patience and gravity of learning is an essential part of justice; and an overspeaking judge is no well-tuned cymbal. Bacon.

What says my counsel learned in the law? Pope.

To Co'UNSEL, kŏŭn'sĕl.[99] v. a. [consilior, Lat.]

1. To give advice or counsel to any person.

But say, Lucetta, now we are alone,
Would'st thou then counsel me to fall in love?
Shaksp.

Truth shall nurse her;
Holy and heav'nly thoughts still counsel her. Shak.

There is danger of being unfaithfully counselled, and more for the good of them that counsel than for him that is counselled. Bacon.

Ill fortune never crushed that man whom good fortune deceived not; I therefore have counselled my friends never to trust to her fairer side, though she seemed to make peace with them. Ben Jonson.

He supports my poverty with his wealth, and I counsel and instruct him with my learning and experience. Taylor.

2. To advise any thing.

The less had been our shame,
The less his counsell'd crime which brands the Grecian name. Dryden's Fables.

Co'UNSELLABLE, kŏŭn'sĕl-â-bl. adj. [from counsel.] Willing to receive and follow the advice or opinions of others.

Very few men of so great parts were more counsellable than he; so that he would seldom be in danger of great errours, if he would communicate his own thoughts to disquisition. Clarendon.

Co'UNSELLOR, kŏŭn'sĕl-lŭr. n. s. [from counsel. This should rather be written counseller.]

1. One that gives advice.

His mother was his counsellor to do wickedly. 2 Chron. xxii. 3.

She would be a counsellor of good things, and a comfort in cares. Wisdom, viii. 9.

Death of thy soul! Those linen cheeks of thine
Are counsellors to fear. Shaksp. Macbeth.

2. Confidant; bosom friend.

In such green palaces the first kings reign'd,
Slept in their shades, and angels entertain'd;
With such old counsellors they did advise,
And by frequenting sacred groves grew wise. Waller.

3. One whose province is to deliberate and advise upon publick affairs.

You are a counsellor,
And by that virtue no man dare accuse you. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

Of counsellors there are two sorts; the first, consiliarii nati, as I may term them; such are the prince of Wales, and others of the king's sons; but the ordinary sort of counsellors are such as the king, out of a due consideration of their worth and abilities, and withal of their fidelity to his person and to his crown, calleth to be of council with him, in his ordinary government. Bacon's Advice to Villiers.

4. One that is consulted in a case of law; lawyer.

A counsellor bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws, may honestly inform a just prince how far his prerogative extends. Dryden.

Co'UNSELLORSHIP, kŏŭn'sĕl-ŭr-ship. n. s. [from counsellor.] The office or post of a privy counsellor.

Of the great offices and officers of the kingdom, the most part are such as cannot well be severed from the counsellorship. Bacon's Advice to Villiers.

To COUNT, kŏŭnt. v. a. [compter, Fr. computare, Lat.]

1. To number; to tell.

Here thro' this grate I can count every one,
And view the Frenchmen. Shaksp. Henry VI.

The vicious count their years; virtuous their acts. Johnson.

For the preferments of the world, he that would reckon up all the accidents that they depend upon, may as well undertake to count the sands, or to sum up infinity. South.

When men in sickness ling'ring lie,
They count the tedious hours by months and years. Dryden.

Argos now rejoice, for Thebes lies low;
Thy slaughter'd sons now smile, and think they won,
When they can count more Theban ghosts than theirs. Dryden.

2. To preserve a reckoning.

Some people in America counted their years by the coming of certain birds amongst them at their certain seasons, and leaving them at others. Locke.

3. To reckon; to place to an account.

He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness. Genesis xv. 6.

Not barely the ploughman's pains is to be counted into the bread we eat; the labour of those who broke the oxen, must all be charged on the account of labour. Locke.

4. To esteem; to account; to reckon; to consider as having a certain character, whether good or evil.

When once it comprehendeth any thing above this, as the differences of time, affirmations, negations, and contradictions in speech, we then count it to have some use of natural reason. Hooker.

Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial. 1 Sam.

Nor shall I count it heinous to enjoy
The publick marks of honour and reward
Conferr'd upon me. Milton's Agonistes.

You would not wish to count this man a foe!
In friendship, and in hatred, obstinate. Philips.

5. To impute to; to charge to.

All th' impossibilities, which poets
Count to extravagance of loose description,
Shall sooner be. Row's Ambitious Stepmother.

To COUNT, kŏŭnt.[313] v. n. To found an account or scheme: with upon.

I think it a great errour to count upon the genius of a nation, as a standing argument in all ages. Swift.

COUNT, kŏŭnt. n. s. [compte, Fr. computus, Lat.]

1. Number.

That we up to your palaces may mount,
Of blessed saints for to increase the count. Spen.

2. Reckoning; number summoned.

By my count,
I was your mother much upon these years. Shaksp.

Since I saw you last,
There is a change upon you.——
———Well, I know not
What counts hard fortune casts upon my face. Shak.

COUNT, kŏŭnt. n. s. [comte, Fr. comes, Lat.] A title of foreign nobility, supposed equivalent to an earl.

Co'UNTABLE, kŏŭn'tâ-bl. adj. [from count.] That which may be numbered.

The evils which you desire to be recounted are very many, and almost countable with those which were hidden in the basket of Pandora. Spenser.

CO'UNTENANCE, kŏŭn'tĕ-nânse. n. s. [contenance, Fr.]

1. The form of the face; the system of the features.

2. Air; look.

A made countenance about her mouth, between simpering and smiling; her head, bowed somewhat down, seemed to languish with over-much idleness. Sidney.

Well, Suffolk, yet thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest:
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted. Shaksp.

So spake our sire, and by his countenance seem'd
Entering on studious thoughts abstruse. Milton.

To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul sedate,
Thus Turnus. Dryden's Æneid.

3. Calmness of look; composure of face.

She smil'd severe; nor with a troubled look,
Or trembling hand, the funeral present took;
Ev'n kept her count'nance, when the lid remov'd
Disclos'd the heart unfortunately lov'd. Dryden.

The two maxims of any great man at court are, always to keep his countenance, and never to keep his word. Swift.

4. Confidence of mien; aspect of assurance: it is commonly used in these phrases, in countenance, and out of countenance.

The night beginning to persuade some retiring place, the gentlewoman, even out of countenance before she began her speech, invited me to lodge that night with her father. Sidney.

We will not make your countenance to fall by the answer ye shall receive. Bacon's New Atlantis.

Their best friends were out of countenance, because they found that the imputations, which their enemies had laid upon them, were well grounded. Claren.

Your examples will meet it at every turn, and put it out of countenance in every place: even in private corners it will soon lose confidence. Spratt.

If the outward profession of religion and virtue were once in practice and countenance at court, a good treatment of the clergy would be the necessary consequence. Swift.

If those preachers would look about, they would find one part of their congregation out of countenance, and the other asleep. Swift.

It is a kind of ill manners to offer objections to a fine woman, and a man would be out of countenance that should gain the superiority in such a contest: a coquette logician may be rallied, but not contradicted. Addison's Freeholder.

It puts the learned in countenance, and gives them a place among the fashionable part of mankind. Add.

5. Kindness or ill-will, as it appears upon the face.

Yet the stout fairy, 'mongst the middest crowd,
Thought all their glory vain in knightly view,
And that great princess too, exceeding proud,
That to strange knight no better countenance allow'd. Spenser.

6. Patronage; appearance of favour; appearance on any side; support.

The church of Christ, which held that profession which had not the publick allowance and countenance of authority, could not use the exercise of the Christian religion but in private. Hooker.

His majesty maintained an army here, to give strength and countenance to the civil magistrate. Davies on Ireland.

Now then we'll use
His countenance for the battle; which being done,
Let her who would be rid of him devise
His speedy taking off. Shaksp. King Lear.

This is the magistrate's peculiar province, to give countenance to piety and virtue, and to rebuke vice and profaneness. Atterbury.

7. Superficial appearance; show; resemblance.

The election being done, he made countenance of great discontent thereat. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

Oh, you blessed ministers above!
Keep me in patience, and with ripen'd time
Unfold the evil, which is here wrapt up
In countenance. Shaksp. Measure for Measure.

Bianca's love
Made me exchange my state with Tranio,
While he did bear my countenance in the town. Shak.

To Co'UNTENANCE, kŏŭn'tĕ-nânse. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To support; to patronise; to vindicate.

Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause. Exodus.

This conceit, though countenanced by learned men, is not made out either by experience or reason. Brown.

This national fault, of being so very talkative, looks natural and graceful in one that has grey hairs to countenance it. Addison.

2. To make a show of.

Each to these ladies love did countenance,
And to his mistress each himself strove to advance. Spenser.

3. To act suitably to any thing; to keep up any appearance.

Malcolm! Banquo!
As from your graves rise up, and walk like sprites,
To countenance this horror. Shaksp.

4. To encourage; to appear in defence.

At the first descent on shore he was not immured with a wooden vessel, but he did countenance the landing in his long-boat. Wotton.

Co'UNTENANCER, kŏŭn'tĕ-nân-sŭr. n. s. [from countenance.] One that countenances or supports another.

Co'UNTER, kŏŭn'tŭr.[98] n. s. [from count.]

1. A false piece of money used as a means of reckoning.

Will you with counter sum
The vast proportion of his infinite? Shaksp.

Though these half-pence are to be received as money in the Exchequer, yet in trade they are no better than counters. Swift.

2. Money, in contempt.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods! with all your thunder-bolts
Dash him to pieces. Shaksp. Julius Cæsar.

3. The table on which goods are viewed, and money told, in a shop.

A fine gaudy minx, that robs our counters every night; and then goes out, and spends it upon our cuckold-makers. Dryden.

In half-whipt muslin needles useless lie,
And shuttlecocks across the counter fly. Gay.

Sometimes you would see him behind his counters selling broadcloth, sometimes measuring linen. Arbuthnot.

Whether thy counter shine with sums untold,
And thy wide-grasping hand grows black with gold. Swift.

4. Counter of a horse, is that part of a horse's fore-hand that lies between the shoulder and under the neck. Far. Dict.

Co'UNTER, kŏŭn'tŭr. adv. [contre, Fr. contra, Lat.]

1. Contrary to; in opposition to: it is commonly used with the verb run, perhaps by a metaphor from the old tournaments.

Shall we erect two wills in God's, and make the will of his purpose and intention run counter to the will of his approbation? South.

The profit of the merchant, and the gain of the kingdom, are so far from being always parallels, that frequently they run counter one to the other. Child.

He thinks it brave, at his first setting out, to signalize himself in running counter to all the rules of virtue. Locke.

2. The wrong way; contrarily to the right course.

How cheerfully on the false trail they cry,
Oh, this is counter, you false Danish dogs! Shaksp.

3. Contrary ways.

A man, whom I cannot deny, may oblige me to use persuasions to another, which, at the same time I am speaking, I may wish may not prevail on him: in this case, it is plain, the will and the desire run counter. Locke.

4. The face, in opposition to the back. Not in use.

They hit one another with darts, as the other do with their hands, which they never throw counter, but at the back of the flyer. Sandys's Journal.

5. This word is often found in composition, and may be placed before either nouns or verbs used in a sense of opposition.

That design was no sooner known, but others of an opposite party were appointed to set a counter-petition on foot. Clarendon.

To COUNTERA'CT, kŏŭn-tŭr-ăkt'. v. a. [counter and act.] To hinder any thing from its effect by contrary agency.

In this case we can find no principle within him strong enough to counteract that principle, and to relieve him. South.

To COUNTERBA'LANCE, kŏŭn-tŭr-băl'lânse. 492 v. a. [counter and balance.] To weigh against; to act against with an opposite weight.

There was so much air drawn out of the vessel, that the remaining air was not able to counterbalance the mercurial cylinder. Boyle.

Few of Adam's children are not born with some bias, which it is the business of education either to take off, or counterbalance. Locke.

COUNTERBA'LANCE, kŏŭn'tŭr-băl-lânse. n. s. [from the verb.] Opposite weight; equivalent power.

But peaceful kings, o'er martial people set,
Each other's poise and counterbalance are. Dry.

Money is the counterbalance to all other things purchaseable by it, and lying, as it were, in the opposite scale of commerce. Locke.

To COUNTERBU'FF, kŏŭn-tŭr-bŭf'. v. a. [from counter and buff.] To impel in a direction opposite to the former impulse; to strike back.

The giddy ship, betwixt the winds and tides
Forc'd back and forwards, in a circle rides,
Stunn'd with the diff'rent blows; then shoots amain,
Till counterbuff'd she stops, and sleeps again. Dry.

COUNTERBU'FF, kŏŭn'tŭr-bŭf. n. s. [counter and buff.] A blow in a contrary direction; a stroke that produces a recoil.

He at the second gave him such a counterbuff, that, because Phalantus was not to be driven from the saddle, the saddle with broken girths was driven from the horse. Sidney.

Go, captain Stub, lead on, and show
What house you come of, by the blow
You give Sir Quintin, and the cuff
You 'scape o' th' sandbags counterbuff. B. Jonson.

Co'UNTERCASTER, kŏŭn'tŭr-kăs-tŭr. n. s. [from counter, for a false piece of money, and caster.] A word of contempt for an arithmetician; a book-keeper; a caster of accounts; a reckoner.

I, of whom his eyes had seen the proof
At Rhodes, at Cyprus, must be let and calm'd
By debtor and creditor, this countercaster. Shaksp.

Co'UNTERCHANGE, kŏŭn'tŭr-tshânje. n. s. [counter and change.] Exchange; reciprocation.

She, like harmless lightning, throws her eye
On him, her brothers, me, her master, hitting
Each object with a joy. The counterchange
Is sev'rally in all. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

To Co'UNTERCHANGE, kŏŭn'tŭr-tshânje. v. a. To give and receive.

COUNTERCHA'RM, kŏŭn'tŭr-tshârm. n. s. [counter and charm.] That by which a charm is dissolved; that which has the power of destroying the effects of a charm.

Now touch'd by countercharms they change again,
And stand majectick, and recall'd to men. Pope.

To COUNTERCHA'RM, kŏŭn'tŭr-tshârm. v. a. [from counter and charm.] To destroy the effect of an enchantment.

Like a spell it was to keep us invulnerable, and so countercharm all our crimes, that they should only be active to please, not hurt us. Decay of Piety.

To COUNTERCHE'CK, kŏŭn-tŭr-tshĕk'. v. a. [counter and check.] To oppose; to stop with sudden opposition.

COUNTERCHE'CK, kŏŭn'tŭr-tshĕk. n. s. [from the verb.] Stop; rebuke.

If again I said his beard was not well cut, he would say I lye: this is called the countercheck quarrelsome. Shaksp.

To COUNTERDRA'W, kŏŭn-tŭr-drâw'. v. a. [from counter and draw.] With painters, to copy a design or painting by means of a fine linen cloth, an oiled paper, or other transparent matter, whereon the strokes, appearing through, are traced with a pencil. Chambers.

COUNTERE'VIDENCE, kŏŭn-tŭr-ĕv'ĕ-dĕnse. n. s. [counter and evidence.] Testimony by which the deposition of some former witness is opposed.

Sense itself detects its more palpable deceits by a counter-evidence, and the more ordinary impostures seldom outlive the first experiments. Glanv.

We have little reason to question his testimony in this point, seeing it is backed by others of good credit; and all because there is no counter-evidence, nor any witness that appears against it. Burnet.

To CO'UNTERFEIT, kŏŭn'tŭr-fît. v. a. [contrefaire, Fr.]

1. To copy with an intent to pass the copy for an original; to forge.

What art thou,
That counterfeits the person of a king? Shakspeare.

It came into this priest's fancy to cause this lad to counterfeit and personate the second son of Edward IV. supposed to be murdered. Bacon's H. VII.

There have been some that could counterfeit the distance of voices, which is a secondary object of hearing, in such sort, as, when they stand fast by you, you would think the speech came from afar off in a fearful manner. Bacon's Natural History.

Say, lovely dream, where couldst thou find
Shadows to counterfeit that face? Waller.

It happens, that not one single line or thought is contained in this imposture, although it appears that they who counterfeited me had heard of the true one. Swift.

2. To imitate; to copy; to resemble.

And, oh, you mortal engines! whose rude throats
Th' immortal Jove's dread clamours counterfeit, Farewel! Shakspeare's Othello.

O Eve! in evil hour thou did'st give ear
To that false worm, of whomsoever taught
To counterfeit man's voice. Milton's Par. Lost.

To counterfeit, is to put on the likeness and appearance of some real excellency: Bristol-stones would not pretend to be diamonds, if there never had been diamonds. Tillotson.

Co'UNTERFEIT, kŏŭn'tŭr-fît. adj. [from the verb.]

1. That which is made in imitation of another, with intent to pass for the original; forged; fictitious.

I learn
Now of my own experience, not by talk,
How counterfeit a coin they are, who friends
Bear in their superscription; in prosperous days
They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their head. Milton.

General observations drawn from particulars, are the jewels of knowledge, comprehending great store in a little room; but they are therefore to be made with the greater care and caution, lest, if we take counterfeit for true, our shame be the greater, when our stock comes to a severe scrutiny. Locke.

2. Deceitful; hypocritical.

True friends appear less moved than counterfeit. Roscommon.

Co'UNTERFEIT, kŏŭn'tŭr-fît. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. One who personates another; an impostor.

I am no counterfeit; to die is to be a counterfeit; for he is but the counterfeit of a man, who hath not the life of a man. Shakspeare.

This priest, being utterly unacquainted with the true person, according to whose pattern he should shape his counterfeit, yet could think it possible for him to instruct his player, either in gesture or fashions, or in fit answers to questions, to come near the resemblance. Bacon.

But trust me, child, I'm much inclin'd to fear
Some counterfeit in this your Jupiter. Addison.

2. Something made in imitation of another, intended to pass for that which it resembles; a forgery.

My father was I know not where,
When I was stampt. Some coiner, with his tools,
Made me a counterfeit; yet my mother seem'd
The Dian of that time. Shakspeare's Cymbeline.

There would be no counterfeits but for the sake of something real; though pretenders seem to be what they really are not, yet they pretend to be something that really is. Tillotson.

Co'UNTERFEITER, kŏŭn'tŭr-fît-ŭr. n. s. [from counterfeit.] A forger; one who contrives copies to pass for originals.

Henry the Second altered the coin, which was corrupted by counterfeiters, to the great good of the commonwealth. Camden.

Co'UNTERFEITLY, kŏŭn'tŭr-fît-lĕ. adv. [from counterfeit.] Falsely; fictitiously; with forgery.

Since the wisdom of their choice is rather to have my cap than my heart, I will practise the insinuating nod, and be off to them most counterfeitly. Shak.

COUNTERFE'RMENT, kŏŭn-tŭr-fĕr'mĕnt. n. s. [counter and ferment.] Ferment opposed to ferment.

What unnatural motions and counterferments must a medley of intemperance produce in the body! When I behold a fashionable table, I fancy I see innumerable distempers lurking in ambuscade among the dishes. Addison's Spectator.

COUNTERFE'SANCE, kŏŭn-tŭr-fē'zăns. n. s. [contrefaisance, Fr.] The act of counterfeiting; forgery. Not in use.

And his man Reynold, with fine counterfesance,
Supports his credit and his countenance. Hubberd.

Such is the face of falsehood, such the sight
Of foul Duessa, when her borrow'd light
Is laid away, and counterfesance known. Fairy Q.

CO'UNTERFORT, kŏŭn'tŭr-fort. n. s. [from counter and fort.]

Counterforts, buttresses or spurs, are pillars serving to support walls or terrasses subject to bulge. Chambers.

COUNTERGA'GE, kŏŭn'tŭr-gāje. n. s. [from counter and gage.] In carpentry, a method used to measure the joints, by transferring the breadth of a mortise to the place where the tenon is to be, in order to make them fit each other. Chambers.

COUNTERGUA'RD, kŏŭn'tŭr-gârd.[92] n. s. [from counter and guard.] A small rampart with parapet and ditch, to cover some part of the body of the place. Military Dict.

To COUNTERMA'ND, kŏŭn-tŭr-mănd'.[79] v. a. [contremander, Fr.]

1. To order the contrary to what was ordered or intended before; to contradict, annul, or repeal a command.

In states notoriously irreligious, a secret and irresistible power countermands their deepest projects, and smites their policies with frustration and a curse. South.

2. To oppose; to contradict the orders of another.

For us to alter any thing, is to lift up ourselves against God, and, as it were, to countermand him. Hooker.

3. To prohibit.

Avicen countermands letting blood in cholerick bodies, because he esteems the blood a bridle of the gall. Harvey.

COUNTERMA'ND, kŏŭn'tŭr-mănd. n. s. [contremand, Fr.] Repeal of a former order.

Have you no countermand for Claudio yet,
But must he die to-morrow? Shakspeare.

To COUNTERMA'RCH, kŏŭn-tŭr-mârtsh'. v. n. [counter and march.] To march backward; to march in indirect ways.

COUNTERMA'RCH, kŏŭn'tŭr-mârtsh. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Retrocession; march backward; march in a different direction from the former.

How are such an infinite number of things placed with such order in the memory, notwithstanding the tumults, marches, and countermarches of the animal spirits. Collier on Thought.

2. Change of measures; alteration of conduct.

They make him do and undo, go forward and backwards by such countermarches and retractions, as we do not willingly impute to wisdom. Burnet.

COUNTERMA'RK, kŏŭn'tŭr-mârk. n. s. [counter and mark.]

1. A second or third mark put on a bale of goods belonging to several merchants, that it may not be opened but in the presence of them all.
2. The mark of the goldsmiths' company, to shew the metal is standard, added to that of the artificer.
3. An artificial cavity made in the teeth of horses, that have outgrown their natural mark, to disguise their age.
4. A mark added to a medal a long time after it is struck, by which the curious know the several changes in value which it has undergone. Chambers.

To COUNTERMA'RK, kŏŭn'tŭr-mârk. v. a. [counter and mark.]

A horse is said to be countermarked, when his corner teeth are artificially made hollow; a false mark being made in the hollow place, in imitation of the eye of a bean, to conceal the horse's age. Farrier's Dict.

COUNTERMI'NE, kŏŭn'tŭr-mine. n. s. [counter and mine.]

1. A well or hole sunk into the ground, from which a gallery or branch runs out under ground, to seek out the enemy's mine, and disappoint it. Military Dict.

After this they mined the walls, laid the powder, and rammed the mouths; but the citizens made a countermine, and thereinto they poured such a plenty of water, that the wet powder could not be fired. Hayward.

2. Means of opposition; means of counteraction.

He thinking himself contemned, knowing no countermine against contempt but terror, began to let nothing pass, which might bear the colour of a fault, without sharp punishment. Sidney.

3 A stratagem by which any contrivance is defeated.

The matter being brought to a trial of skill, the countermine was only an act of self-preservation. L'Estrange.

To COUNTERMI'NE, kŏŭn-tŭr-mine'. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To delve a passage into an enemy's mine, by which the powder may evaporate without mischief.
2. To counterwork; to defeat by secret measures.

Thus infallibly it must be, if God do not miraculously countermine us, and do more for us than we can do against ourselves. Decay of Piety.

COUNTERMO'TION, kŏŭn-tŭr-mō'shŭn. n. s. [counter and motion.] Contrary motion; opposition of motion.

That resistance is a countermotion, or equivalent to one, is plain by this, that any body which is pressed must needs press again on the body that presses it. Digby on the Soul.

If any of the returning spirits should happen to fall foul upon others which are outward bound, these countermotions would overset them, or occasion a later arrival. Collier.

COUNTERMU'RE, kŏŭn'tŭr-mūre. n. s. [contremur, Fr.] A wall built up behind another wall, to supply its place.

The great shot flying through the breach, did beat down houses; but the countermure, new built against the breach, standing upon a lower ground, it seldom touched. Knolles.

COUNTERNA'TURAL, kŏŭn-tŭr-năt'sh'ŭ-răl. adj. [counter and natural.] Contrary to nature.

A consumption is a counternatural hectick extenuation of the body. Harvey on Consumptions.

COUNTERNO'ISE, kŏŭn'tŭr-nóēze. n. s. [counter and noise.] A sound by which any other noise is overpowered.

They endeavoured, either by a constant succession of sensual delights to charm and lull asleep, or else by a counternoise of revellings and riotous excesses to drown, the softer whispers of their conscience. Calamy's Sermons.

COUNTERO'PENING, kŏŭn-tŭr-ō'pn-ĭng. n. s. [counter and opening.] An aperture or vent on the contrary side.

A tent, plugging up the orifice, would make the matter recur to the part disposed to receive it, and mark the place for a counteropening. Sharp.

COUNTERPA'CE, kŏŭn'tŭr-pāse. n. s. [counter and pace.] Contrary measure; attempts in opposition to any scheme.

When the least counterpaces are made to these resolutions, it will then be time enough for our malecontents. Swift.

CO'UNTERPANE, kŏŭn'tŭr-pāne. n. s. [contrepoint, Fr.] A coverlet for a bed, or any thing else woven in squares. It is sometimes written, according to etymology, counterpoint.

In ivory coffers I have stuff'd my crowns;
In cyprus chests my arras counterpanes. Shaksp.

COUNTERPA'RT, kŏŭn'tŭr-pârt. n. s. [counter and part.] The correspondent part; the part which answers to another, as two papers of a contract; the part which fits another, as the key of a cypher.

In some things the laws of Normandy agreed with the laws of England; so that they seem to be, as it were, copies or counterparts one of another. Hale's Law of England.

An old fellow with a young wench, may pass for a counterpart of this fable. L'Estrange.

Oh counterpart
Of our soft sex; well are you made our lords:
So bold, so great, so god-like are you form'd,
How can you love so silly things as women? Dryden.

He is to consider the thought of his author, and his words, and to find out the counterpart to each in another language. Dryden.

In the discovery, the two different plots look like counterparts and copies of one another. Addison.

COUNTERPLE'A, kŏŭn'tŭr-plē. n. s. [from counter and plea.] In law, a replication: as, if a stranger to the action begun, desire to be admitted to say what he can for the safeguard of his estate, that which the demandant allegeth against this request is called a counterplea. Cowell.

To COUNTERPLO'T, kŏŭn-tŭr-plŏt'. v. a. [counter and plot.] To oppose one machination by another; to obviate art by art.

COUNTERPLO'T, kŏŭn'tŭr-plŏt. n. s. [from the verb.] An artifice opposed to an artifice.

The wolf that had a plot upon the kid, was confounded by a counterplot of the kid's upon the wolf; and such a counterplot as the wolf, with all his sagacity, was not able to smell out. L'Estrange.

CO'UNTERPOINT, kŏŭn'tŭr-pŏint. n. s. A coverlet woven in squares, commonly spoken counterpane. See COUNTERPANE.

To COUNTERPO'ISE, kŏŭn-tŭr-pŏēze'. v. a. [counter and poise.]

1. To counterbalance; to be equi-ponderant to; to act against with equal weight.

Our spoils we have brought home
Do more than counterpoise a full third part
The charges of the action. Shakspeare.

The force and the distance of weights counterpoising one another, ought to be reciprocal. Digby.

2. To produce a contrary action by an equal weight.

The heaviness of bodies must be counterpoised by a plummet fastened about the pulley to the axis. Wilkins.

3. To act with equal power against any person or cause.

So many freeholders of English will be able to beard and to counterpoise the rest. Spenser.

CO'UNTERPOISE, kŏŭn'tŭr-pŏĕze. n. s. [from counter and poise.]

1. Equiponderance; equivalence of weight; equal force in the opposite scale of the balance.

Take her by the hand,
And tell her she is thine; to whom I promise
A counterpoise, if not in thy estate,
A balance more replete. Shakspeare.

Fastening that to our exact balance, we put a metalline counterpoise into the opposite scale. Boyle.

2. The state of being placed in the opposite scale of the balance.

Th' Eternal hung forth his golden scales,
Wherein all things created first he weigh'd,
The pendulous round earth, with balanc'd air
In counterpoise. Milton.

3. Equipollence; equivalence of power.

The second nobles are a counterpoise to the higher nobility, that they grow not too potent. Bacon.

Their generals, by their credit in the army, were, with the magistrates and other civil officers, a sort of counterpoise to the power of the people. Swift.

COUNTERPO'ISON, kŏŭn'tŭr-pŏĕ'zn. n. s. [counter and poison.] Antidote; medicine by which the effects of poison are obviated.

Counterpoisons must be adapted to the cause; for example, in poison from sublimate, corrosive, and arsenick. Arbuthnot.

COUNTERPRE'SSURE, kŏŭn-tŭr-prĕsh'ŭre. n. s. [counter and pressure.] Opposite force; power acting in contrary directions.

Does it not all mechanick heads confound,
That troops of atoms from all parts around,
Of equal number, and of equal force,
Should to this single point direct their course;
That so the counterpressure ev'ry way,
Of equal vigour, might their motions stay,
And by a steady poise the whole in quiet lay?
Blackmore.

COUNTERPRO'JECT, kŏŭn-tŭr-prŏd'jĕkt. n. s. [counter and project.] Correspondent part of a scheme.

A clear reason why they never sent any forces to Spain, and why the obligation not to enter into a treaty of peace with France, until that entire monarchy was yielded as a preliminary; was struck out of the counterproject by the Dutch. Swift.

To COUNTERPRO'VE, kŏŭn-tŭr-prŏŏv'.[164] v. a. [from counter and prove.] To take off a design in black lead, or red chalk, by passing it through the rolling-press with another piece of paper, both being moistened with a sponge. Chambers.

COUNTERRO'L, kŏŭn-tŭr-rŏle.[406] v. a. [counter and roll. This is now generally written as it is spoken, control.] To preserve the power of detecting frauds by another account.

COUNTERRO'LMENT, kŏŭn'tŭr-rŏle-mĕnt. n. s. [from counterrol.] A counter account; controlment.

This manner of exercising of this office, hath many testimonies, interchangeable warrants, and counterrolments, whereof each, running through the hands, and resting in the power, of many several persons, is sufficient to argue and convince all manner of falsehood. Bacon.

CO'UNTERSCARP, kŏŭn'tŭr-skärp. n. s. [from counter and scarp.] That side of the ditch which is next the camp, or properly the talus that supports the earth of the covert-way; although by this term is often understood the whole covert-way, with its parapet and glacis: and so it is to be understood when it is said the enemy lodged themselves on the counterscarp. Harris.

To COUNTERSI'GN, kŏŭn-tŭr-sine'. v. a. [from counter and sign.] To sign an order or patent of a superiour, in quality of secretary, to render it more authentick. Thus charters are signed by the king, and countersigned by a secretary of state, or lord chancellor. Chambers.

COUNTERTE'NOR, kŏŭn-tŭr-tĕn'nŭr. n. s. [from counter and tenor.] One of the mean or middle parts of musick; so called, as it were, opposite to the tenor. Harris.

I am deaf: this deafness unqualifies me for all company, except a few friends with countertenor voices. Swift.

COUNTERTI'DE, kŏŭn'tŭr-tide. n. s. [counter and tide.] Contrary tide; fluctuations of the water.

Such were our countertides at land, and so
Presaging of the fatal blow,
In your prodigious ebb and flow. Dryden.

COUNTERTI'ME, kŏŭn'tŭr-time. n. s. [counter and time; contretemps, Fr.]

1. The defence or resistance of a horse, that intercepts his cadence, and the measure of his manage. Farrier's Dict.

2. Defence; opposition.

Let cheerfulness on happy fortune wait,
And give not thus the countertime to fate. Dryden.

COUNTERTU'RN, kŏŭn'tŭr-tŭrn. n. s. [counter and turn.]

The catastasis, called by the Romans status, the height and full growth of the play, we may call properly the counterturn, which destroys that expectation, embroils the action in new difficulties, and leaves you far distant from that hope in which it found you. Dryden.

To COUNTERVA'IL, kŏŭn-tŭr-vāle'. v. a. [contra and valeo, Lat.] To be equivalent to; to have equal force or value; to act against with equal power.

In some men there may be found such qualities as are able to countervail those exceptions which might be taken against them, and such men's authority is not likely to be shaken off. Hooker.

And therewithal he fiercely at him flew,
And with important outrage him assail'd;
Who, soon prepar'd to field, his sword forth drew,
And him with equal valour countervail'd. F. Queen.

The outward streams, which descend, must be of so much force as to countervail all that weight whereby the ascending side does exceed the other. Wilkins's Dædalus.

We are to compute, that, upon balancing the account, the profit at last will hardly countervail the inconveniencies that go along with it. L'Estrange.

COUNTERVA'IL, kŏŭn'tŭr-vāle. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Equal weight; power or value sufficient to obviate any effect or objection.

2. That which has equal weight or value with something else.

Surely, the present pleasure of a sinful act is a poor countervail for the bitterness of the review, which begins where the action ends, and lasts for ever. South's Sermons.

COUNTERVIE'W, kŏŭn'tŭr-vū. n. s. [counter and view.]

1. Opposition; a posture in which two persons front each other.

Mean while, ere thus was sinn'd and judg'd on earth,
Within the gates of hell sat sin and death
In counterview. Milton's Par. Lost.

2. Contrast; a position in which two dissimilar things illustrate each other.

I have drawn some lines of Linger's character, on purpose to place it in counterview or contrast with that of the other company. Swift.

To COUNTERWO'RK, kŏŭn-tŭr-wŭrk'. v. a. [counter and work.] To counteract; to hinder any effect by contrary operations.

But heav'n's great view is one, and that the whole:
That counterworks each folly and caprice;
That disappoints th' effects of ev'ry vice. Pope.

CO'UNTESS, kŏŭn-tĕs. n. s. [comitissa, Lat. comtesse, Fr.] The lady of an earl or count.

I take it, she that carries up the train,
Is that old noble lady, the duchess of Norfolk.
—It is, and all the rest are countesses. Shakspeare.

It is the peculiar happiness of the countess of Abingdon to have been so truly loved by you while she was living, and so gratefully honoured after she was dead. Dryden.

CO'UNTING-HOUSE, kŏŭn'tĭng-hŏŭse. n. s. [count and house.] The room appropriated by traders to their books and accounts.

Men in trade seldom think of laying out money upon land, till their profit has brought them in more than their trade can well employ; and their idle bags cumbering their counting-houses, put them upon emptying them. Locke.

CO'UNTLESS, kŏŭnt'lĕs. adj. [from count.] Innumerable; without number; not to be reckoned.

Ay, tear for tear, and loving kiss for kiss,
Thy brother Marcus tenders on thy lips:
O were the sum of these that I should pay
Countless and infinite, yet would I pay them.
Shakspeare.

But oh, her mind, that orcus which includes
Legions of mischief, countless multitudes
Of former curses. Donne.

By one countless sum of woes opprest,
Hoary with cares, and ignorant of rest,
We find the vital springs relax'd and worn;
Thus, thro' the round of age, to childhood we return. Prior.

I see, I cried, his woes, a countless train;
I see his friends o'erwhelm'd beneath the main.
Pope's Odyssey.

CO'UNTRY, kŭn'trĕ. n. s. [contrée, Fr. contrata, low Lat. supposed to be contracted from conterrata.]

1. A tract of land; a region, as distinguished from other regions.

They require to be examined concerning the descriptions of those countries of which they would be informed. Spratt.

2. The parts of a region distant from cities or courts; rural parts.

Would I a house for happiness erect,
Nature alone should be the architect;
She'd build it more convenient than great,
And doubtless in the country chuse her seat.
Cowley.

I see them hurry from country to town, and then from the town back again into the country. Spect.

3. The place which any man inhabits, or in which he at present resides.

Send out more horses, skirre the country round,
Hang those that talk of fear. Shaksp. Macbeth.

4. The place of one's birth; the native soil.

The king set on foot a reformation in the ornaments and advantages of our country. Spratt.

O save my country, heav'n! shall be your last.
Pope.

5. The inhabitants of any region.

All the country in a general voice,
Cried hate upon him; all their pray'rs and love
Were set on Hereford. Shaksp. Henry IV.

Cou'ntry, kŭn'trė. adj.

1. Rustick; rural; villatick.

Cannot a country wench know, that, having received a shilling from one that owes her three, and a shilling also from another that owes her three, the remaining debts in each of their hands are equal? Locke

I never meant any other, than that Mr. Trott should confine himself to country dances. Spectator.

He comes no nearer to a positive, clear idea of a positive infinite, than the country fellow had of the water which was yet to pass the channel of the river where he stood. Locke.

Talk but with country people, or young people, and you shall find that the notions they apply this name to, are so odd, that nobody can imagine they were taught by a rational man. Locke.

A country gentleman, learning Latin in the university, removes thence to his mansion-house. Locke.

The low mechanicks of a country town do somewhat outdo him. Locke.

Come, we'll e'en to our country seat repair,
The native home of innocence and love. Norris.

2. Of an interest opposite to that of courts, as, the country party.

3. Peculiar to a region or people.

She laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn, spake in her country language. 2 Maccabees, vii. 27.

4. Rude; ignorant; untaught.

We make a country man dumb, whom we will not allow to speak but by the rules of grammar. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

Co'untryman, kŭn'trė-măn.[88] n. s. [from country and man.]

1. One born in the same country, or tract of ground. Locke.

See, who comes here?
My countryman; but yet I know him not. Shaksp.

Homer, great bard! so fate ordain'd, arose;
And, bold as were his countrymen in fight,
Snatch'd their fair actions from degrading prose,
And set their battles in eternal light. Prior.

The British soldiers act with greater vigour under the conduct of one whom they do not consider only as their leader, but as their countryman. Addison.

2. A rustick; one that inhabits the rural parts.

All that have business to the court, and all countrymen coming up to the city, leave their wives in the country. Graunt.

3. A farmer; a husbandman.

A countryman took a boar in his corn. L'Estr.

Co'unty, kŏŭn'tė. n. s. [comté, Fr. comitatus, Lat.]

1. A shire; that is, a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the administration of justice; so that there is no part of the kingdom but what lieth within some county. Every county is governed by a yearly officer, called a sheriff, who puts in execution all the commands and judgments of the king's courts. Of these counties four are termed county-palatines, as that of Lancaster, Chester, Durham and Ely. A county-palatine is a jurisdiction of so high a nature, that the chief governors of these, by special charter from the king, sent out all writs in their own name; and did all things touching justice as absolutely as the prince himself, only acknowledging him their superior and sovereign. But this power has, by a statute in Henry VIII. his time, been much abridged. There are likewise counties corporate, which are certain cities or ancient boroughs upon which our princes have thought good to bestow extraordinary liberties. Of these London is one, York another, the city of Chester a third, and Canterbury a fourth. And to these may be added many more; as the county of the town of Kingston upon Hull, the county of the town of Haverfordwest, and the county of Litchfield. County is, in another signification, used for the county-court. Cowell.

Discharge your powers unto their several counties, As we will ours. Shaksp. Henry IV.

He caught his death the last county sessions, where he would go to see justice done to a poor widow-woman, and her fatherless children. Addison's Spectator.

2. An earldom.

3. [Compté.] A count; a lord. Now wholly obsolete.

The gallant, young, and noble gentleman,
The county Paris. Shaksp. Romeo and Juliet.

He made Hugh Lupus county palatine of Chester, and gave that earldom to him and his heirs, to hold the same ita liberè ad gladium, sicut rex tenebat Angliam ad coronam. Davies.

COUPE'E, kŏŏ-pėė'. n. s. [Fr.] A motion in dancing, when one leg is a little bent and suspended from the ground, and with the other a motion is made forwards. Chamb.

COU'PLE, kŭp'pl.[314] n. s. [couple, Fr. copula, Lat.]

1. A chain or tie that holds dogs together.

I'll keep my stable-stand where
I lodge my wife; I'll go in couples with her,
Than when I feel and see no further trust her.
Shakspeare.

It is in some sort with friends as it is with dogs in couples; they should be of the same size and humour. L'Estrange.

2. Two; a brace.

He was taken up by a couple of shepherds, and by them brought to life again. Sidney.

A schoolmaster, who shall teach my son and yours, I will provide; yea, though the three do cost me a couple of hundred pounds. Ascham.

A piece of chrystal inclosed a couple of drops, which looked like water when they were shaken, though perhaps they are nothing but bubbles of air. Addison on Italy.

By adding one to one, we have the complex idea of a couple. Locke.

3. A male and his female.

So shall all the couples three;
Ever true in loving be. Shak. Mids. Night's Dr.

Oh! alas!
I lost a couple, that 'twixt heaven and earth
Might thus have stood, begetting wonder, as You gracious couple do. Shaksp. Winter's Tale.

I have read of a feigned commonwealth, where the married couple are permitted, before they contract, to see one another naked. Bac. New Atlantis.

He said: the careful couple join their tears,
And then invoke the gods with pious prayers.
Dryden.

All succeeding generations of men are the progeny of one primitive couple. Bentley's Sermons.

To Co'uple, kŭp'pl.[405] v. a. [copulo, Lat.]

1. To chain together.

Huntsman, I charge thee, tender well my hounds;
And couple Clowder with the deep-mouth'd Brach.
Shakspeare.

2. To join one to another.

What greater ills have the heavens in store,
To couple coming harms with sorrow past. Sidney.

And wheresoe'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still we went coupled and inseparable. Shaksp.

Put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together that it may be one. Exodus, xxvi. 11.

They behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. 1 Peter, iii. 2

Their concernments were so coupled, that if nature had not, yet their religions would have made them brothers. South.

That man makes a mean figure in the eyes of reason, who is measuring syllables and coupling rhimes, when he should be mending his own soul, and securing his own immortality. Pope.

3. To marry; to wed; to join in wedlock.

I shall rejoice to see you so coupled, as may be fit both for your honour and your satisfaction. Sidney.

I am just going to assist with the archbishop, in degrading a parson who couples all our beggars, by which I shall make one happy man. Swift.

To Co'uple, kŭp'pl. v. n. To join in embraces.

Waters in Africa, being rare, divers sorts of beasts come from several parts to drink; and so being refreshed, fall to couple, and many times with several kinds. Bacon.

Thou, with thy lusty crew,
Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men,
And coupled with them, and begot a race.
Milton's Paradise Regained.

That great variety of brutes in Africa, is by reason of the meeting together of brutes of several species, at water, and the promiscuous couplings of males and females of several species.
Hale's Origin of Mankind.

After thi allia ce
Let tigers match with hi and w es with sheep,
And every creature coupl ith his . Dryden.

Co'uple-beggar, k pl-bé r. n. s. [couple and beggar.] One at makes it his business to n ry begg s to each other.

No couple-beggar in the land
E'er join'd such numbers hand in hand. Swift.

Co'uplet, kŭp'lĕt. n. s. [Fr.]

1. Two verses; a pair of rhimes.

Then would they cast away their pipes, and holding hand in hand, dance by the only cadence of their voices, which they would use in singing some short couplets, whereto the one half beginning, the other half should answer. Sidney.

Then at the last, an only couplet fraught
With some unmeaning thing they call a thought;
A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along. Pope.

In Pope I cannot read a line;
But with a sigh I wish it mine:
When he can in one couplet fix
More sense than I can do in six.

It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, Pox take him and his wit! Swift.

2. A pair, as of doves.

Anon, as patient as the female dove,
Ere that her golden couplets are disclos'd,
His silence will sit drooping. Shaksp. Hamlet.

CO'URAGE, kůr'ridje.[99] n. s. [courage, Fr. from cor, Lat.] Bravery; active fortitude; spirit of enterprize.

The king-becoming graces,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude,
I have no relish of them. Shaks. Macbeth.

Their discipline
Now mingled with their courage. Shak. Cymbeline.

Hope arms their courage; from their tow'rs they throw
Their darts with double force, and drive the foe. Dryden.

Courage, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion. That courage which arises from the sense of our duty, and from the fear of offending Him that made us, acts always in an uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason. Addison's Guardian.

Nothing but the want of common courage was the cause of their misfortunes. Swift.

COURA'GEOUS, kůr-rá'jė-ůs. adj. [from courage.]

1. Brave; daring; bold; enterprizing; adventurous; hardy; stout.

And he that is courageous among the mighty, shall flee away naked in that day. Amos ii. 16.

Let us imitate the courageous example of St. Paul, who chose then to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it. Atterbury.

2. It is used ludicrously by Shakspeare for outrageous.

He is very courageous mad, about his throwing into the water. Shakspeare.

COURA'GEOUSLY, kůr-rá'jė-ůs-lė. adv. [from courageous.] Bravely; stoutly; boldly.

The king the next day presented him battle upon the plain, the fields there being open and champaign: the earl courageously came down, and joined battle with him. Bacon's Henry VII.

COURA'GEOUSNESS, kůr-rá'jė-ůs-nės. n. s. [from courageous.] Bravery; boldness; spirit; courage.

Nicanor hearing of the manliness and the courageousness that they had to fight for their country, durst not try the matter by the sword. 2 Maccabees, xiv. 18.

7. Progress from one gradation to another; process.

When the state of the controversy is plainly determined, it must not be altered by another disputant in the course of the disputation. Watts.

8. Order of succession: as, every one in his course.

If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 1 Cor. xiv. 27.

9. Stated and orderly method, or manner.

If she live long,
And in the end meet the old course of death,
Women will all turn monsters. Shak. King Lear.

The duke cannot deny the course of law. Shaksp.

If God, by his revealed declaration, first gave rule to any man, he, that will claim by that title, must have the same positive grant of God for his succession; for, if it has not directed the course of its descent and conveyance, no body can succeed to this title of the first ruler. Locke.

10. Series of successive and methodical procedure.

The glands did resolve during her course of physick, and she continueth very well to this day. Wiseman's Surgery.

11. The elements of an art exhibited and explained, in a methodical series. Hence our courses of philosophy, anatomy, chymistry, and mathematicks. Chambers.

12. Conduct; manner of proceeding.

That worthy deputy finding nothing but a common misery, took the best course he possibly could to establish a commonwealth in Ireland. Davies on Ireland.

He placed commissioners there, who governed it only in a course of discretion, part martial, part civil. Davies on Ireland.

Give willingly what I can take by force;
And know obedience is your safest course. Dryden.

But if a right course be taken with children, there will not be so much need of common rewards and punishments. Locke.

'Tis time we should decree
What course to take. Addison's Cato.

The senate observing how, in all contentions, they were forced to yield to the tribunes and people, thought it their wisest course to give way also to time. Swift.

13. Method of life; train of actions.

A woman of so working a mind, and so vehement spirits, as it was happy she took a good course; or otherwise it would have been terrible. Sidney.

His addiction was to courses vain;
His companies unletter'd, rude, and shallow;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports. Shakspeare's Henry V.

As the dropsy-man, the more he drinks, the drier he is, and the more he still desires to drink; even so a sinner, the more he sins, the apter is he to sin, and more desirous to keep still a course in wickedness. Perkins.

Men will say,
That beauteous Emma vagrant courses took,
Her father's house and civil life forsook. Prior.

14. Natural bent; uncontrolled will.

It is best to leave nature to her course, who is the sovereign physician in most diseases. Temple.

So every servant took his course,
And, bad at first, they all grew worse. Prior.

15. Catamenia.

The stoppage of women's courses, if not suddenly looked to, sets them undoubtedly into a consumption, dropsy, or some other dangerous disease. Harvey.

16. Orderly structure.

The tongue defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature. James, iii. 6.

17. [In architecture.] A continued range of stones, level or of the same height, throughout the whole length of the building, and not interrupted by any aperture. Harris.

18. Series of consequences.

19. Number of dishes set on at once upon the table.

Worthy Sir, thou bleed'st:
Thy exercise hath been too violent
For a second course of fight. Shaksp.

Then with a second course the tables load,
And with full chargers offer to the god. Dryden's Æneid.

You are not to wash your hands till after you have sent up your second course. Swift.

So quick retires each flying course, you'd swear
Sancho's dread doctor and his wand were there. Pope.

20. Regularity; settled rule.

21. Empty form.

Men talk as if they believed in God, but they live as if they thought there was none; their vows and promises are no more than words of course. L'Estrange.

22. Of course. By consequence.

With a mind unprepossessed by doctors and commentators of any sect, whose reasonings, interpretation, and language, which I have been used to, will of course make all chime that way; and make another, and perhaps the genuine meaning of the author, seem harsh, strained, and uncouth to me. Locke.

23. Of course. By settled rule.

Sense is of course annex'd to wealth and power;
No muse is proof against a golden shower. Garth.

Neither shall I be so far wanting to myself, as not to desire a patent, granted of course to all useful projectors. Swift.

To COURSE, kôrse. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To hunt; to pursue.

The big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase. Shaksp. As you like it.

The king is hunting the deer; I am coursing myself. Shakspeare.

Where's the thane of Cawdor?
We cours'd him at the heels, and had a purpose
To be his purveyor. Shaksp. Macbeth.

2. To pursue with dogs that hunt in view.

It would be tried also in flying of hawks, or in coursing of a deer, or hart, with greyhounds. Bacon's Natural History.

I am continually starting hares for you to course; we were certainly cut out for one another; for my temper quits an amour just where thine takes it up. Congreve's Old Bachelor.

3. To put to speed; to force to run.

When they have ân appetite
To venery, let them not drink nor eat,
And course them oft, and tire them in the heat. May's Virgil.

To COURSE, kòrse. v. n. To run; to rove about.

Swift as quicksilver it courses through
The nat'ral gates and alleys of the body. Shaksp. Hamlet.

The blood, before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inwards to the parts extreme. Shakspeare.

She did so course o'er my exteriours, with such a greedy intention, that the appetite of her eye did seem to scorch me up like a burning glass. Shaksp. Merry Wives of Windsor.

Ten brace and more of greyhounds, snowy fair,
And tall as stags, ran loose, and cours'd around his chair. Dryden.

All, at once
Relapsing quick, as quickly re-ascend
And mix, and thwart, extinguish, and renew,
All ether coursing in a maze of light. Thomson.

CO'URSER, kòr'sûr. n. s. [from course; coursier, Fr.]

1. A swift horse; a war horse; a word not used in prose.

He proudly pricketh on his courser strong,
And Atin ay him pricks with spurs of shame and wrong. Spenser.

Then to his absent guest the king decreed
A pair of coursers, born of heav'nly breed;
Who from their nostrils breath'd etherial fire,
Whom Circe stole from her celestial sire. Dryden.

The impatient courser pants in every vein,
And, pawing, seems to beat the distant plain;
Hills, vales, and floods appear already cross'd,
And, ere he starts, a thousand steps are lost. Pope.

2. One who pursues the sport of coursing hares.

A leash is a leathern thong, by which a falconer holds his hawk, or a courser leads his greyhound. Hanmer.

COURT, kòrte.[318] n. s. [cour, Fr. koert, Dut. curtis, low Lat.]

1. The place where the prince resides; the palace.

Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires,
Men so disorderly, so debauch'd and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shews like a riotous inn; epicurism and lust
Make it more like a tavern, or a brothel,
Than a grac'd palace. Shaksp. King Lear.

It shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls. Isaiah, xxvi. 13.

His exactness, that every man should have his due, was such, that you would think he had never seen a court: the politeness with which this justice was administered, would convince you he never lived out of one. Prior's Dedication.

A suppliant to your royal court I come. Pope.

2. The hall or chamber where justice is administered.

Are you acquainted with the difference
That holds this present question in the court? Shaksp.

St. Paul being brought unto the highest court in Athens, to give an account of the doctrine he had preached concerning Jesus and the resurrection, took occasion to imprint on those magistrates a future state. Atterbury.

3. Open space before a house.

You must have, before you come to the front, three courts; a green court plain, with a wall about it; a second court of the same, but more garnished, with little turrets, or other embellishments, upon the wall; and a third court, to square with the front, not to be built but inclosed with a naked wall. Bacon.

Suppose it were the king's bedchamber, yet the meanest man in the tragedy must come and dispatch his business, rather than in the lobby or court yard (which is fitter for him) for fear the stage should be cleared, and the scenes broken. Dryd.

4. A small opening inclosed with houses and paved with broad stones, distinguished from a street.

5. Persons who compose the retinue of a prince.

Their wisdom was so highly esteemed, that some of them were always employed to follow the courts of their kings, to advise them. Temple.

6. Persons who are assembled for the administration of justice.

7. Any jurisdiction, military, civil, or ecclesiastical.

If any noise or soldier you perceive
Near to the wall, by some apparent sign
Let us have knowledge at the court of guard. Shaksp.

The archbishop
Of Canterbury, accompanied with other
Learned and reverend fathers of his order,
Held late a court at Dunstable. Shaksp.

I have at last met with the proceedings of the court baron, held in that behalf. Spectator.

8. The art of pleasing; the art of insinuation.

Him the prince with gentle court did board. Spenser.

Hast thou been never base? Did love ne'er bend
Thy frailer virtue, to betray thy friend?
Flatter me, make thy court, and say it did,
Kings in a crowd would have their vices hid. Dryd.

Some sort of people, placing a great part of their happiness in strong drink, are always forward to make court to my young master, by offering that which they love best themselves. Locke.

I have been considering why poets have such ill success in making their court, since they are allowed to be the greatest and best of all flatterers; the defect is, that they flatter only in print or in writing. Swift.

9. It is often used in composition in most of its senses.

To COURT, kòrte. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To woo; to solicit a woman to marriage

Follow a shadow, it flies you;
Seem to fly it, it will pursue:
So court a mistress, she denies you;
Let her alone, she will court you. Ben Jonson.

Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,
The neighb'ring princes court her nuptial bed. Dryden's Æneid.

Alas! Sempronius, wouldst thou talk of love
To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger?
Thou might'st as well court the pale trembling vestal,
While she beholds the holy flame expiring. Addison's Cato.

Ev'n now, when silent scorn is all they gain,
A thousand court you, though they court in vain. Pope.

2. To solicit; to seek.

Their own ease and satisfaction would quickly teach children to court commendation, and avoid doing what they found condemned. Locke.

3. To flatter; to endeavour to please.

COURT-CHAPLAIN, kòrte-tshâp'lîn. n. s. [court and chaplain.] One who attends the king to celebrate the holy offices.

'Tis a brave knight to cool a courtezan. Shaksp.

With them there are no stews, no dissolute houses, no courtesans, nor any thing of that kind; nay they wonder, with detestation, at you in Europe, which permit such things. Bacon.

The Corinthian is a column lasciviously decked like a courtezan. Wotton.

Charixus, the brother of Sappho, in love with Rhodope the courtezan, spent his whole estate upon her. Addison.

CO'URTESY, kûr'tè-sè. n. s. [courtoisie, Fr. cortesia, Ital.]

1. Elegance of manners; civility; complaisance.

Sir, you are very welcome to our house:
It must appear in other ways than words,
Therefore I scant this breathing courtesy. Shaksp.

Who have seen his estate, his hospitality, his courtesy to strangers. Peacham.

He, who was compounded of all the elements of affability and courtesy towards all kind of people, brought himself to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the queen. Clarendon.

Courtesy is sooner found in lowly shades
With smoky rafters, than in tap'stry halls,
And courts of princes, whence it first was nam'd. Milton.

So gentle of condition was he known,
That through the court his courtesy was blown. Dryden.

2. An act of civility or respect.

You spurn'd me such a day; another time
You call'd me dog; and for these courtesies,
I'll lend you thus much money. Shaksp.

Repose you there, while I to the hard house
Return, and force their scanted courtesy. Shaksp

When I was last at Exeter
The mayor in courtesy shew'd me the castle. Shaksp

Sound all the lofty instruments of war,
And by that musick let us all embrace;
For heav'n to earth some of us never shall
A second time do such a courtesy. Shaksp.

Other states, assuredly, cannot be justly accused for not staying for the first blow; or for not accepting Polyphemus's courtesy, to be the last that shall be eaten up. Bacon.

3. The reverence made by women.

Some country girl, scarce to a court'sy bred,
Would I much rather than Cornelia wed;
If, supercilious, haughty, proud, and vain,
She brought her father's triumphs in her train. Dryden.

The poor creature was as full of courtesies as if I had been her godmother: the truth on 't is, I endeavoured to make her look something Christian-like. Cong. Old Bachelor.

4. A tenure, not of right, but by the favour of others; as, to hold upon courtesy.

5. Courtesy of England. A tenure by which, if a man marry an inheritrix, that is, a woman seised of land, and getteth a child of her that comes alive into the world, though both the child and his wife die forthwith, yet, if she were in possession, shall be keep the land during his life, and is called tenant per legem Angliæ, or by the courtesy of England. Cowell.

To Co'URTESY, kůrt'sė. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To perform an act of reverence: it is now only used of women.

Toby approaches, and court'sies there to me. Shaksp.

The petty traffickers,
That court'sy to them, do them reverence. Shaksp.

2. To make a reverence in the manner of ladies.

If I should meet her in my way,
We hardly court'sy to each other. Prior.

Co'URTIER, kŏrte'yůr.[113] n. s. [from court.]

1. One that frequents or attends the courts of princes.

He hath been a courtier, he swears.——
If any man doubts that, let him put me to my purgation. I have trod a measure; I have flattered a lady; I have been politick with my friend, smooth with mine enemy; I have undone three taylors; I have had four quarrels, and like to have fought one. Shaksp.

You are a flattering boy; now, I see you'll be a courtier. Shaksp.

You know I am no courtier, nor versed in state-affairs. Bacon.

The principal figure in a picture, is like a king among his courtiers, who ought to dim the lustre of his attendants. Dryden.

2. One that courts or solicits the favour of another.

What
Made thee, all honour'd, honest Roman Brutus,
With the arm'd rest, courtiers of beauteous freedom,
To drench the capitol? Shaksp. Antony and Cleop.

There was not among all our princes a greater courtier of the people than Richard III.; not out of fear, but wisdom. Suckling.

Co'URTINE, kůr'tĭn.[208] See CURTAIN.

Co'URTLIKE, kŏrte'like. adj. [court and like.] Elegant; polite.

Our English tongue is, I will not say as sacred as the Hebrew, or as learned as the Greek, but as fluent as the Latin, as courteous as the Spanish, as courtlike as the French, and as amorous as the Italian. Camden's Remains.

Co'URTLINESS, kŏrt'lė-nės. n. s. [from courtly.] Elegance of manners; grace of mien; complaisance; civility.

The slightest part that you excel in, is courtliness. Lord Digby to Sir Kenelm Digby.

Co'URTLING, kŏrte'lĭng. n. s. [from court.] A courtier; a retainer to a court.

Courtling, I rather thou should'st utterly Dispraise my work, than praise it frostily. Jonson.

Co'URTLY, kŏrte'lė. adj. [from court.] Relating or retaining to the court; elegant; soft; flattering.

In our own time (excuse some courtly strains.)
No whiter page than Addison's remains. Pope.

Co'URTLY, kŏrte'lė. adv. In the manner of courts; elegantly.

They can produce nothing so courtly writ, or which expresses so much the conversation of a gentleman, as Sir John Suckling. Dryden.

Co'URTSHIP, kŏrte'shĭp. n. s. [from court.]

1. The act of soliciting favour.

He paid his courtship with the crowd,
As far as modest pride allow'd. Swift.

2. The solicitation of a woman to marriage.

Be merry, and employ your chiefest thoughts
To courtship, and such fair ostents of love,
As shall conveniently become you there. Shaksp.

In tedious courtship we declare our pain,
And ere we kindness find, first meet disdain. Dryd.

Every man in the time of courtship, and in the first entrance of marriage, puts on a behaviour like my correspondent's holiday suit. Addis.

3. Civility; elegance of manners.

My courtship to an university,
My modesty I give to soldiers bare;
My patience to a gamester's share. Donne.

CO'USIN, kůz'zn.[314 169] n. s. [cousin, Fr. consanguineus, Lat.]

1. Any one collaterally related more remotely than a brother or sister.

Macbeth unseam'd him.
Oh valiant cousin! worthy gentleman! Shaksp

Tybalt, my cousin! O my brother's child!
Unhappy sight! alas, the blood is spill'd
Of my dear kinsman. Shaksp. Romeo and Juliet.

Thou art, great lord, my father's sister's son,
And cousin german to great Priam's seed. Shaksp.

2. A title given by the king to a nobleman, particularly to those of the council.

COW, kŏů.[323] n. s. [in the plural anciently kine, or keen, now commonly cows; cu. Sax. koe, Dut.] The female of the bull; the horned animal with cloven feet, kept for her milk and calves.

We see that the horns of oxen and cows, for the most part, are larger than the bull's; which is caused by abundance of moisture, which in the horns of the bull faileth. Bacon.

After the fever is diminished, asses and goats milk may be necessary; yea, a diet of cows milk alone. Wiseman's Surgery.

Then, leaving in the fields his grazing cows,
He sought himself some hospitable house:
Good Creton entertain'd his godlike guest. Dryden.

To Cow, kŏů. v. a. [from coward, by contraction.] To depress with fear; to oppress with habitual timidity.

Macduff was from his mother's womb
Untimely ripp'd.———
———Accursed be that tongue that tells me so,
For it hath cow'd my better part of man. Shaksp.

By reason of their frequent revolts, they have drawn upon themselves the pressures of war so often, that it seems to have somewhat cowed their spirits. Howel's Vocal Forest.

For when men by their wives are cow'd,
Their horns of course are understood. Hudibras.

Cow-HERD, kŏů'hĕrd. n. s. [cow, and hŷꝛd, Sax. a keeper.] One whose occupation is to tend cows.

Cow-HOUSE, kŏů'hŏůse. n. s. [cow and house.] The house in which kine are kept.

You must house your milch-cows, that you give hay to, in your cow-house all night. Mortimer.

Cow-LEECH, kŏů'lėtsh. n. s. [cow and leech.] One who professes to cure distempered cows.

To Cow-LEECH, kŏů'lėtsh. v. n. To profess to cure cows.

Though there are many pretenders to the art of farriering and cow-leeching, yet many of them are very ignorant, especially in the country. Mortimer's Husbandry.

Cow-WEED, kŏů'wėde. n. s. [cow and weed.] A species of chervil.

Cow-WHEAT, kŏů'hwėte. n. s. [cow and wheat.] A plant.

CO'WARD, kŏů'ůrd.[88 323] n. s. [couard, Fr. of uncertain derivation.]

1. A poltroon; a wretch whose predominant passion is fear.

Pyrocles did such wonders, beyond belief, as was able to lead Musidorus to courage, though he had been born a coward. Sidney.

There was a soldier that vaunted, before Julius Cæsar, of the hurts he had received in his face. Cæsar, knowing him to be but a coward, told him, You were best take heed, next time you run away, how you look back. Bacon.

Some are brave one day, and cowards another, as great captains have often told me, from their own experience and observation. Temple.

A coward does not always escape with disgrace, but sometimes also he loses his life. South.

Tremble ye not, oh friends! and cowards fly,
Doom'd by the stern Telemachus to die! Pope's Odyssey.

2. It is sometimes used in the manner of an adjective.

Having more man than wit about me, I drew;
And rais'd the house with loud and coward cries. Shaksp.

Invading fears repel my coward joy,
And ills foreseen the present bliss destroy. Prior.

Co'WARDICE, kŏů'ůr-dis.[142] n. s. [from coward.] Fear; habitual timidity; pusillanimity; want of courage.

Certes, Sir knight, ye been too much to blame,
Thus for to blot the honour of the dead;
And with foul cowardice his carcase shame,
Whose living hands immortaliz'd his name. Fairy Queen.

Gallant and fearless courage will turn into a native and heroick valour, and make them hate the cowardice of doing wrong. Milton on Education.

None was disgrac'd; for falling is no shame,
And cowardice alone is loss of fame:
The vent'rous knight is from the saddle thrown,
But 'tis the faylt of fortune, not his own. Dryden's Fables.

This great, this holy, this terrible Being, is present to all our affections; sees every treacherous inclination of our heart to desert his service; and treasures up, against the day of his wrath, the secret cowardice which deters us from asserting his cause; which prevails on us to compliment the vices of the great, to applaud the libertine, and laugh with the profane. Rogers's Sermons

Co'wardliness, kŏŭ'ûrd-lê-nês. n. s. [from cowardly.] Timidity; cowardice.

Co'wardly, kŏŭ'ûrd-lê. adj. [from coward.]

1. Fearful; timorous; pusillanimous.

An Egyptian soothsayer made Antonius believe that his genius, otherwise brave and confident, was in the presence of Octavius poor and cowardly. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

2. Mean; befitting a coward; proceeding from fear.

I do find it cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fall, so to prevent
The time of life. Shaksp. Julius Cæsar.

Let all such as can enlarge their consciences like hell, and style a cowardly silence in Christ's cause discretion, know, that Christ will one day scorn them. South.

Co'wardly, kŏŭ'ûrd-lê. adv. In the manner of a coward; meanly; vilely.

He sharply reproved them as men of no courage, who had most cowardly turned their backs upon their enemies. Knolles.

Co'wardship, kŏŭ'ûrd-ship. n. s. [from coward.] The character or qualities of a coward; meanness: a word not now in use.

A very paltry boy, and more a coward than a hare: his dishonesty appears in leaving his friend here in necessity, and denying him; and for his cowardship, ask Fabian. Shaksp.

To Co'wer, kŏŭ'ûr.[223] v. n. [cwrrian, Welsh; courber, Fr. or perhaps borrowed from the manner in which a cow sinks on her knees.] To sink by bending the knees; to stoop; to shrink.

Let the pail be put over the man's head above water, then he cower down, and the pail be pressed down with him. Bacon.

The splitting rocks cow'r'd in the sinking sands,
And would not dash me with their ragged sides.
Shaksp.

As thus he spake, each bird and beast beheld,
Approaching two and two; these cow'ring low
With blandishment, each bird stoop'd on his wing.
Milton.

Our dame sits cow'ring o'er a kitchen fire;
I draw fresh air, and nature's works admire. Dryd.

Co'wish, kŏŭ'îsh. adj. [from To cow, to awe.] Timorous; fearful; mean; pusillanimous; cowardly. Not in use.

It is the cowish terrour of his spirit,
That dares not undertake: he'll not feel wrong,
Which tie him to an answer. Shaksp. King Lear.

Co'wkeeper, kŏŭ'kê-pûr. n. s. [cow and keeper.] One whose business is to keep cows.

The terms cowkeeper and hogherd are not to be used in our poetry; but there are no finer words in the Greek language. Broome.

Cowl, kŏŭl.[323] n. s. [cuzle, Saxon; cucullus, Lat.]

1. A monk's hood.

You may imagine that Francis Cornfield did scratch his elbow, when he had sweetly invented, to signify his name, saint Francis with his friery cowl in a cornfield. Camden.

What differ more, you cry, than crown and cowl?
I'll tell you, friend, a wise man and a fool. Pope.

2. [Perhaps from cool, cooler, a vessel in which hot liquor is set to cool.] A vessel in which water is carried on a pole between two.

Cowl-staff, kŏŭl'stâf. n. s. [cowl and staff.] The staff on which a vessel is supported between two men.

Mounting him upon a cowl-staff,
Which (tossing him something high)
He apprehended to be Pegasus. Suckling.

The way by a cowl-staff is safer: the staff must have a bunch in the middle, somewhat wedge-like, and covered with a soft bolster. Wiseman.

Co'wslip, kŏŭ'slip. [n. s. paralysis; cuſlyppe, Sax. as some think, from their resemblance of scent to the breath of a cow; perhaps from growing much in pasture grounds, and often meeting the cow's lip.]

Cowslip is also called pagil, grows wild in the meadows, and is a species of primrose. Miller.

He might as well say, that a cowslip is as white as a lily. Sidney.

Where the bee sucks, there suck I;
In a cowslip's bell I lie. Shaksp. Tempest.

Thy little sons
Permit to range the pastures: gladly they
Will mow the cowslip posies, faintly-sweet. Philips.

Cows-lungwort, kŏŭs'lŭng-wûrt. n. s. A species of mullein.

Co'xcomb, kŏks'kŏme. n. s. [cock and comb, corrupted from cock's comb.]

1. The top of the head.

As the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i' the pasty alive; she rapt them o' th' coxcombs with a stick, and cried, Down, wantons, down! Shaksp. King Lear.

2. The comb resembling that of a cock, which licensed fools wore formerly in their caps.

There, take my coxcomb: why, this fellow has banished two of his daughters, and did the third a blessing against his will: if thou follow him, thou must needs wear my coxcomb. Shaksp.

3. A fop; a superficial pretender to knowledge or accomplishments.

I sent to her,
By this same coxcomb that we have i' th' wind,
Tokens and letters, which she did resend. Shak.

I scorn, quoth she, thou coxcomb silly,
Quarter or council from a foe. Hudibras.

It is a vanity for every pretending coxcomb to make himself one of the party still with his betters. L'Estrange.

They overflowed with smart repartees, and were only distinguished from the intended wits by being called coxcombs, though they deserved not so scandalous a name. Dryden.

Some are bewilder'd in the maze of schools,
And some made coxcombs, nature meant but fools.
Pope.

4. A kind of red flower.

Coxco'mical, kŏks-kŏm'îk-âl. adj. [from coxcomb.] Foppish; conceited: a low word, unworthy of use.

Because, as he was a very natural writer, and they were without prejudice, without prepossession, without affectation, and without the influence of coxcomical, senseless cabal, they were at liberty to receive the impressions which things naturally made on their minds. Dennis.

Coy, kŏê. adj. [coi, Fr. from quietus, Lat.]

1. Modest; decent.

Jason is as coy as is a maide;
He looked piteously, but nought he said. Chaucer.

2. Reserved; not accessible; not easily condescending to familiarity.

And vain delight she saw the light did pass,
A foe of folly and immodest toy;
Still solemn sad, or still disdainful coy. Spenser

Like Phœbus sung the no less am'rous boy:
Like Daphne she, as lovely and as coy. Waller.

At this season every smile of the sun, like the smile of a coy lady, is as dear as it is uncommon. Pope.

The Nile's coy source. Grainger.

To Coy, kŏê.[329] v. n. [from the adjective.]

1. To behave with reserve; to reject familiarity.

What, coying it again!
No more; but make me happy to my gust,
That is, without your struggling. Dryden

Retire! I beg you, leave me.——
——Thus to coy it!
With one who knows you too! Rowe's J. Shore.

2. To make difficulty; not to condescend willingly.

If he coy'd
To hear Cominius speak, I'll keep at home.
Shaksp. Coriolanus.

To Coy, kŏê.[329] v. a. [for decoy.] To allure. Not in use.

I'll mountebank their loves,
Coy their hearts from them, and come home beloved
Of all the trades in Rome. Shaksp. Coriolanus.

Co'yly, kŏê'lê. adv. [from coy.] With reserve; with disinclination to familiarity.

This said, his hand he coyly snatch'd away
From forth Antinous' hand. Chapman's Odyssey.

Co'yness, kŏê'nês. n. s. [from coy.] Reserve; unwillingness to become familiar.

When the sun hath warmed the earth and water, three or four male carps will follow a female; and she putting on a seeming coyness, they force her through weeds and flags. Walton.

When the kind nymph would coyness feign,
And hides but to be found again. Dryden.

Co'ystrel, kŏê'strîl. n. s. A species of degenerate hawk.

One they might trust, their common wrongs to wreak:
The musquet and the coystrel were too weak,
Too fierce the falcon. Dryd. Hind and Panther.

Coz, kŭz. n. s. A cant or familiar word, contracted from cousin.

Be merry, coz; since sudden sorrow
Serves to say thus, some good thing comes to-morrow. Shaksp.

To CO'ZEN, kŭz'zn.[314 159] v. a. [To cose is in the old Scotch dialect, as Junius observes, to chop or change; whence cozen to cheat; because in such traffick there is commonly fraud.] To cheat; to trick; to defraud.

Let the queen pay never so fully, let the muster-master view them never so diligently, let the deputy or general look to them never so exactly, yet they can cozen them all. Spenser.

Goring loved no man so well but that he would cozen him, and expose him to public mirth for having been cozened. Clarendon.

He that suffers a government to be abused by carelessness or neglect, does the same thing with him that maliciously and corruptly sets himself to cozen it. L'Estrange.

You are not obliged to a literal belief of what the poet says; but you are pleased with the image, without being cozened by the fiction. Dryden.

What if I please to lengthen out his date
A day, and take a pride to cozen fate.
Dryden's Aurengzebe.

Children may be cozened into a knowledge of the letters, and be taught to read, without perceiving it to be any thing but a sport. Locke on Education.

Co'zenage, kŭz'zn-âje.[90] n. s. [from cozen.] Fraud; deceit; artifice; fallacy; trick; cheat; the practice of cheating.

They say this town is full of cozenage,
As nimble jugglers that deceive the eye,
Disguised cheaters. Shaksp.

Wisdom without honesty is meer craft and cozenage; and therefore the reputation of honesty must first be gotten, which cannot be but by living well: a good life is a main argument. Ben Jonson's Discoveries.

There's no such thing as that we beauty call,
It is meer cozenage all;
For though some long ago
Like certain colours mingled so and so,
That doth not tie me now from chusing new. Suckling.

Imaginary appearances offer themselves to our impatient minds, which entertain these counterfeits, without the least suspicion of their cozenage. Glanville's Scepsis.

Strange coz'nage! none would live past years again,
Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain;
And from the dregs of life think to receive
What the first sprightly running could not give. Dryden's Aurengzebe.

But all these are trifles, if we consider the fraud and cozenage of trading men and shopkeepers. Swift.

Co'zener, kůz'zn-ůr.[98] n. s. [from cozen.] A cheater; a defrauder.

Indeed, Sir, there are cozeners abroad, and therefore it behoves men to be wary. Shaksp.

CRAB, krâb. n. s. [cpabba, Sax. krabbe, Dutch.]

1. A crustaceous fish.

Those that cast their shell are, the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, the hodmandod or dodman, and the tortoise. The old shells are never found; so as it is like they scale off and crumble away by degrees. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

The fox catches crab fish with his tail, which Olaus Magnus saith he himself was an eye-witness of. Derham.

2. A wild apple; the tree that bears a wild apple.

Noble stock
Was graft with crab tree slip, whose fruit thou art. Shaksp.

Fetch me a dozen crab tree staves, and strong ones; these are but switches. Shaksp.

When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl,
Then nightly sings the staring owl. Shaksp.

Tell why a graft, taking nourishment from a crab stock, shall have a fruit more noble than its nurse and parent. Taylor.

3. A peevish morose person.

4. A wooden engine with three claws for launching of ships, or heaving them into the dock. Phillips.

5. The sign in the zodiack.

Then parts the Twins and Crab, the dog divides,
And Argo's keel, that broke the frothy tides. Creech.

Crab, krâb. adj. It is used by way of contempt for any sour or degenerate fruit; as, a crab cherry, a crab plum.

Better gleanings their worn soil can boast
Than the crab vintage of the neighb'ring coast. Dryden.

Cra'bbed, krâb'bêd.[366] adj. [from crab.]

1. Peevish; morose; cynical; sour.

A man of years, yet fresh, as mote appear,
Of swarth complexion, and of crabbed hue,
That him full of melancholy did shew. Spenser.

O, she is
Ten times more gentle, than her father's crabbed;
And he's compos'd of harshness. Shak. Tempest.

2. Harsh; unpleasing.

That was when
Three crabbed months had sour'd themselves to death,
Ere I could make thee open thy white hand,
And clepe thyself my love. Shak. Winter's Tale.

How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns. Milton.

3. Difficult; perplexing.

Beside, he was a shrewd philosopher,
And had read ev'ry text and gloss over;
Whate'er the crabbed'st author hath,
He understood b' implicit faith. Hudibras.

Lucretius had chosen a subject naturally crabbed. Dryden.

Your crabbed rogues that read Lucretius
Are against gods, you know. Prior.

Cra'bbedly, krâb'bêd-lê. adv. [from crabbed.] Peevishly; morosely; with perplexity.

Cra'bbedness, krâb'bêd-nês. n. s. [from crabbed.]

1. Sourness of taste.

2. Sourness of countenance; asperity of manners.

3. Difficulty; perplexity.

Cra'ber, krâ'bůr. n. s.

The poor fish have enemies enough, beside such unnatural fishermen as otters, the cormorant, and the craber, which some call the water-rat. Walton.

Crabs-eyes, krâbs ize. n. s. Whitish bodies, rounded on one side, and depressed on the other, heavy, moderately hard, and without smell. They are not the eyes of any creature, nor do they belong to the crab, but are produced by the common crawfish: the stones are bred in two separate bags, one on each side of the stomach. They are alkaline, absorbent, and in some degree diuretick. Hill.

Several persons had, in vain, endeavoured to store themselves with crabs-eyes. Boyle.

CRACK, krâk. n. s. [kraeck, Dut.]

1. A sudden disruption, by which the parts are separated but a little way from each other.

2. The chink, fissure, or vacuity made by disruption; a narrow breach.

Contusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the scull, either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, or in the contrary part. Wiseman.

At length it would crack, in many places; and those cracks, as they dilated, would appear of a pretty good, but yet obscure and dark sky-colour. Newton's Opticks.

3. The sound of any body bursting or falling.

If I say sooth, I must report they were
As cannons overcharg'd with double cracks. Shaksp. Macbeth.

Now day appears, and with the day the king,
Whose early care had robb'd him of his rest:
Far off the cracks of falling houses ring,
And shrieks of subjects pierce his tender breast. Dryden.

4. Any sudden and quick sound.

A fourth?—start eye!
What! will the line stretch out to th' crack of doom? Shaksp.

Vulcan was employed in hammering out thunderbolts, that every now and then flew up from the anvil with dreadful cracks and flashes. Addison.

5. Change of voice in puberty.

And let us, Paladour, though now our voices
Have got the mannish crack, sing him to th' ground. Shaksp.

6. Breach of chastity.

I cannot
Believe this crack to be in my dread mistress,
So sovereignly being honourable. Shaksp.

7. Craziness of intellect.

8. A man crazed.

I have invented projects for raising millions, without burthening the subjects; but cannot get the parliament to listen to me, who look upon me as a crack and a projector. Addison.

9. A whore, in low language.

10. A boast.

Leasings, backbitings, and vain-glorious cracks,
All those against that fort did bend their batteries. Spenser.

11. A boaster. This is only in low phrase.

To Crack, krâk. v. a. [kraecken, Dut.]

1. To break into chinks; to divide the parts a little from each other.

Look to your pipes, and cover them with fresh and warm litter out of the stable, a good thickness, lest the frost crack them. Mortimer.

2. To break; to split.

O, madam, my heart is crack'd, it's crack'd. Shaksp.

Thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reason but because thou hast hazel eyes. Shaksp.

Should some wild fig-tree take her native bent,
And heave below the gaudy monument,
Would crack the marble titles, and disperse
The characters of all the lying verse. Dryd. Juv.

Or as a lute, which in moist weather rings
Her knell alone, by cracking of her strings. Donne.

Honour is like that glassy bubble,
That finds philosophers such trouble;
Whose least part crack'd, the whole does fly,
And wits are crack'd to find out why. Hudibras.

3. To do any thing with quickness or smartness.

Sir Balaam now, he lives like other folks;
He takes his chirping pint, he cracks his jokes. Pope.

4. To break or destroy any thing.

You'll crack a quart together! Ha, will you not? Shaksp.

Love cools, friendship falls off, brothers divide: in cities, mutinies; in countries, discord; in palaces, treason; and the bond cracked 'twixt son and father. Shaksp. King Lear.

5. To craze; to weaken the intellect

I was ever of opinion, that the philosopher's stone, and an holy war, were but the rendezvous of cracked brains, that wore their feather in their heads. Bacon's Holy War.

He thought none poets till their brains were crackt. Roscommon.

To Crack, krâk'. v. n.

1. To burst; to open in chinks.

By misfortune, it cracked in the cooling, whereby we were reduced to make use of one part, which was straight and intire. Boyle.

2. To fall to ruin

The credit not only of banks, but of exchequers, cracks when little comes in, and much goes out. Dryden.

3. To utter a loud and sudden sound.

I will board her, though she chide as loud
As thunder, when the clouds in autumn crack. Shaksp.

4. To boast: with of.

To look like her, are chimney-sweepers black,
And since her time are colliers counted bright,
And Ethiops of their sweet complexion crack:
Dark needs no candles now, for dark is light. Shaksp.

Crack-brained, krâk-brând'. adj. [crack

and brained.] Crazy; without right reason.

We have sent you an answer to the ill-grounded sophisms of those crack-brained fellows.
Arbuthnot and Pope.

CRACK-HEMP, krâk'hêmp. n. s. [crack and hemp.] A wretch fated to the gallows; a crack-rope: furcifer.

Come hither, crack-hemp.
————I hope I may chuse, Sir.
—Come hither, you rogue:
What, have you forgot me?
Shakesp. Taming of the Shrew.

CRACK-ROPE, krâk'rôpe. n. s. [crack and rope.] A fellow that deserves hanging.

CRA'CKER, krâk'ûr. n. s [from crack.]

1. A noisy boasting fellow.

What cracker is this same that deafs our ears
With this abundance of superfluous breath?
Shaksp. King John.

2. A quantity of gunpowder confined so as to burst with great noise.

The bladder, at its breaking, gave a great report, almost like a cracker. Boyle.

And when, for furious haste to run,
They durst not stay to fire a gun,
Have done 't with bonfires, and at home
Made squibs and crackers overcome. Hudibras.

Then furious he begins his march,
Drives rattling o'er a brazen arch,
With squibs and crackers arm'd, to throw
Among the trembling crowd below. Swift.

To CRA'CKLE, krâk'kl.[405] v. n. [from crack.] To make slight cracks; to make small and frequent noises; to decrepitate.

All these motions, which we saw,
Are but as ice which crackles at a thaw. Donne.

I fear to try new love,
As boys to venture on the unknown ice
That crackles underneath them. Dryden.

Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire;
Her crown and jewels crackled in the fire.
Dryden's Æneid.

Marrow is a specifick in that scurvy which occasions a crackling of the bones; in which case marrow performs its natural function of moistening them.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CRA'CKNEL, krâk'nêl. n. s. [from crack.] A hard brittle cake.

Albee my love he seek with daily sute,
His clownish gifts and curtesies I disdain,
His kids, his cracknels, and his early fruit. Spenser.

Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells;
And with our offerings help to raise his vails.
Dryden's Juvenal.

CRA'DLE, krâ'dl.[405] n. s. [cnaðel, Sax.]

1. A moveable bed, on which children or sick persons are agitated with a smooth and equal motion, to make them sleep.

She had indeed, Sir, a son for her cradle, ere she had a husband for her bed. Shaksp. King Lear.

No jutting frieze,
Buttrice, nor coigne of vantage, but this bird
Hath made his pendant bed and procreant cradle.
Shaksp.

His birth, perhaps, some paltry village hides,
And sets his cradle out of fortune's way. Dryden.

A child knows his nurse and his cradle, and by degrees the playthings of a little more advanced age. Locke.

The cradle and the tomb, alas, so nigh!
To live is scarce distinguish'd from to die. Prior.

Me let the tender office long engage,
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death.
Pope.

2. It is used for infancy, or the first part of life.

He knew them to be inclined altogether to war, and therefore wholly trained them up, even from their cradle, in arms and military exercises.
Spenser's Ireland.

The new duke's daughter, her cousin, loves her; being ever, from their cradles, bred together.
Shaksp. As you like it.

They should scarcely depart from a form of worship, in which they had been educated from their cradle. Clarendon.

3. [With surgeons.] A case for a broken bone, to keep off pressure.

4. [With shipwrights.] A frame of timber raised along the outside of a ship by the bulge, serving more securely and commodiously to help to launch her.
Harris.

To CRA'DLE, krâ'dl. v. a. [from the substantive.] To lay in a cradle; to rock in a cradle.

He that hath been cradled in majesty, will not leave the throne to play with beggars.
Glanville's Apollonius.

The tears steal from our eyes, when in the street
With some betrothed virgin's herse we meet;
Or infant's fun'ral, from the cheated womb
Convey'd to earth, and cradled in a tomb. Dryden.

He shall be cradled in my ancient shield, so famous through the universities. Arbuth. and Pope.

CRADLE-CLOTHES, krâ'dl-klôze. n. s. [from cradle and clothes.] Bed-clothes belonging to a cradle.

O could it be prov'd
That some night-tripping fairy had exchang'd,
In cradle-cloaths, our children, where they lay,
And call mine Percy, his Plantagenet;
Then would I have his Harry, and he mine. Shak.

CRAFT, krâft.[79] n. s. [cpæpt, Sax. creft, in old Welsh.]

1. Manual art; trade.

I hear an objection, even from some well-meaning men, that these delightful crafts may be divers ways ill applied in a land. Wotton's Architecture.

2. Art; ability; dexterity.

A poem is the work of the poet; poesy is his skill or craft of making, the very fiction itself of the work.
Ben Jonson.

3. Fraud; cunning; artifice.

Th' offence is holy that she hath committed;
And this deceit loses the name of craft,
Of disobedience, or unduteous title. Shaksp.

This gives us a full view of wonderful art and craft in raising such a structure of power and iniquity. Ayliffe.

4. Small sailing vessels.

To CRAFT, krâft. v. n. [from the noun.] To play tricks; to practise artifice. Now out of use.

You 've made fair hands,
You and your crafts! You 've crafted fair.
Shaksp. Coriolanus.

CRA'FTILY, krâf'tê-lê. adv. [from crafty] Cunningly; artfully; with more art than honesty

But that which most impaired his credit, was the common report that he did, in all things, favour the Christians; and had, for that cause, craftily persuaded Solyman to take in hand the unfortunate Persian war. Knolles.

May he not craftily infer
The rules of friendship too severe,
Which chain him to a hated trust;
Which make him wretched to be just? Prior.

CRA'FTINESS, krâf'tê-nês. n. s. [from crafty.] Cunning; stratagem

He taketh the wise in their own craftiness Job.

CRA'FTSMAN, krâfts'mân. n. s. [craft and man.] An artificer; a manufacturer; a mechanick.

That her became, as polish'd ivory,
Which cunning craftsman's hand hath overlaid
With fair vermillion. Spenser.

What reverence he did throw away on slaves,
Wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles.
Shaksp.

What a resemblance this advice carries to the oration of Demetrius to his fellow craftsmen!
Decay of Piety.

CRA'FTSMASTER, krâfts'mâs-tûr. n. s. [craft and master.] A man skilled in his trade.

He is not his craftsmaster, he doth not do it right.
Shaksp.

There is art in pride: a man might as soon learn a trade. Those who were not brought up to it, seldom prove their craftsmaster. Collier on Pride.

CRA'FTY, krâf'tê. adj. [from craft.] Cunning; artful; full of artifices; fraudulent; sly.

Nay, you may think my love was crafty love,
And call it cunning. Shaksp. King John.

This oppression did, of force and necesity, make the Irish a crafty people; for such as are oppressed, and live in slavery, are ever put to their shifts.
Davies on Ireland.

Before he came in sight, the crafty god
His wings dismiss'd, but still retain'd his rod.
Dryden.

No body was ever so cunning as to conceal their being so; and every body is shy and distrustful of crafty men. Locke.

CRAG, krâg. n. s.

1. Crag is, in British, a rough steep rock: and is used in the same sense in the northern counties at this day. Gibson.

CRA'GGEDNESS, krâg'gêd-nês. n. s. [from cragged.] Fullness of crags or prominent rocks.

The craggedness or steepness of that mountain, maketh many parts of it in a manner inaccessible.
Brerewood.

CRA'GGINESS, krâg'gê-nês. n. s. [from craggy.] The state of being craggy.

CRA'GGY, krâg'gê.[383] adj. [from crag.] Rugged; full of prominences; rough to walk on or climb.

That same wicked wight
His dwelling has low in an hollow cave,
Far underneath a craggy cliff ypight,
Dark, doleful, dreary, like a greedy grave. Spenser.

It was impossible to pass up the woody and craggy hills, without the loss of these commanders.
Raleigh's Essays.

Mountaineers that from Severus came,
And from the craggy clifts of Tetrica. Dryden.

The town and republick of St. Marino stands on the top of a very high and craggy mountain.
Addison on Italy.

To CRAM, krâm. v. a. [cpamman, Sax.]

1. To stuff; to fill with more than can conveniently be held.

As much love in rhyme,
As would be cramm'd up in a sheet of paper,
Writ on both sides the leaf, margent and all. Shak.

Being thus crammed in the basket, a couple of Ford's knaves were called. Shaksp.

Thou hast spoke as if thy eldest son should be a fool, whose scull Jove cram with brains. Shaksp. Twelfth Night.

Cram not in people by sending too fast company after company; but so as the number may live well in the plantation, and not by surcharge be in penury. Bacon.

2. To fill with food beyond satiety.

You'd mollify a judge, would cram a squire;
Or else some smiles from court you may desire. King.

I am sure children would be freer from diseases, if they were not crammed so much as they are by fond mothers, and were kept wholly from flesh the first three years. Locke.

As a man may be eating all day, and, for want of digestion, is never nourished; so these endless readers may cram themselves in vain with intellectual food. Watts on the Mind.

But Annius, crafty seer,
Came cramm'd with capon from where Pollio dines. Pope.

3. To thrust in by force.

You cram these words into mine ears, against
The stomach of my sense. Shaksp.

Huffer, quoth Hudibras, this sword
Shall down thy false throat cram that word. Hudibras

Fate has cramm'd us all into one lease,
And that even now expiring. Dryden's Cleomenes.

In another printed paper it is roundly expressed, that he will cram his brass down our throats. Swift.

To CRAM, krâm. v. n. To eat beyond satiety.

The godly dame, who fleshly failings damns,
Scolds with her maid, or with her chaplain crams. Pope.

CRA'MBO, krâm'bô. n. s. [A cant word, probably without etymology.] A play at which one gives a word, to which another finds a rhyme; a rhyme.

So Mævius, when he drain'd his skull
To celebrate some suburb trull,
His similies in order set,
And ev'ry crambo he could get. Swift.

CRAMP, krâmp. n. s. [krampe, Dut. crampe, Fr.]

1. A spasm or contraction of the limbs, generally removed by warmth and rubbing.

For this, be sure, to-night thou shalt have cramps,
Side-stitches that shall pen thy breath up. Shaksp. Tempest.

In a retreat he outruns any lacquey; marry, in coming on, he has the cramp. Shaksp.

The cramp cometh of contraction of sinews; which is manifest, in that it cometh either by cold or dryness. Bacon's Natural History.

Hares, said to live on hemlock, do not make good the tradition; and he that observes what vertigoes, cramps, and convulsions follow thereon, in these animals, will be of our belief. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

2. A restriction; confinement; obstruction; shackle.

A narrow fortune is a cramp to a great mind, and lays a man under incapacities of serving his friend. L'Estrange.

3. A piece of iron bent at each end, by which two bodies are held together.

To the uppermost of these there should be fastened a sharp graple, or cramp of iron, which may be apt to take hold of any place where it lights. Wilkins.

CRAMP, krâmp. adj. Difficult; knotty: a low term.

To CRAMP, krâmp. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To pain with cramps or twitches.

When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, ev'n then
A waterish humour swell'd, and ooz'd again. Dryden's Virgil.

2. To restrain; to confine; to obstruct; to hinder.

It is impossible to conceive the number of inconveniencies that will ensue, if borrowing be cramped. Bacon.

There are few but find that some companies benumb and cramp them, so that in them they can neither speak nor do any thing that is handsome. Glanville's Scepsis.

He who serves has still restraints of dread upon his spirits, which, even in the midst of action, cramps and ties up his activity. South's Sermons.

Dr. Hammond loves to contract and cramp the sense of prophecies. Burnet's Theory.

The antiquaries are for cramping their subject, into as narrow a space as they can, and for reducing the whole extent of a science into a few general maxims. Addison on Italy.

Marius used all endeavours for depressing the nobles, and raising the people, particularly for cramping the former in their power of judicature. Swift.

No more
Th' expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold,
But full of life, and vivifying soul. Thomson.

3. To bind with crampirons.

CRA'MPFISH, krâmp'fish. n. s. [from cramp and fish.] The torpedo, which benumbs the hands of those that touch it.

2. A pair of pincers terminating in a point, used by surgeons.

CRA'NIUM, krâ'nê-ûm.[507] n. s. [Lat.] The skull.

In wounds made by contusion, when the cranium is a little naked, you ought not presently to crowd in dossils; for if that contused flesh be well digested, the bone will incarn with the wound without much difficulty. Wiseman's Surgery.

CRANK, krângk.[408] n. s. [This word is perhaps a contraction of crane-neck, to which it may bear some resemblance, and is part of the instrument called a crane.]

1. A crank is the end of an iron axis turned square down, and again turned square to the first turning down; so that on the last turning down a leather thong is slipt, to tread the treddle-wheel about. Moxon.

2. Any bending or winding passage.

I send it through the rivers of your blood,
Even to the court, the heart; to th' seat o' th' brain;
And through the cranks and offices of man,
The strongest nerves, and small inferior veins,
From me receive that natural competency,
Whereby they live. Shaksp. Coriolanus.

3. Any conceit formed by twisting or changing, in any manner, the form or meaning of a word.

Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton whiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek. Milton.

CRANK, krângk. adj. [from onkranck, Dut. Skinner.]

1. Healthy; sprightly: sometimes corrupted to cranky. Not in use.

They looken bigge, as bulls that been bate,
And bearen the crag so stiff and so state
As cockle on his dunghill crowing cranke. Spenser.

2. Among sailors, a ship is said to be crank, when, by the form of its bottom, or by being loaded too much above, it is liable to be overset. [from kranck, Dut. sick.]

To CRA'NKLE, krâng'kl.[405] v. n. [from crank, as it signifies something bent.] To run in and out; to run in flexures and windings.

See how this river comes me crankling in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land
A huge half moon, a monstrous cantle out. Shak.

To CRA'NKLE, krâng'kl. v. a. To break into unequal surfaces; to break into angles.

Old Vaga's stream,
Forc'd by the sudden shock, her wonted track
Forsook, and drew her humid train aslope,
Crankling her banks. Philips.

CRA'NKNESS, krângk'nês. n. s. [from crank.]

1. Health; vigour.

2. Disposition to overset.

CRA'NNIED, krân'nê-êd. adj. [from cranny.] Full of chinks.

A wall it is, as I would have you think,
That had in it a crannied hole or chink. Shaksp.

A very fair fruit, and not unlike a citron; but somewhat rougher chopt and crannied, vulgarly conceived the marks of Adam's teeth. Brown.

CRA'NNY, krân'nê. n. s. [cren, Fr. crena, Lat.] A chink; a cleft; a fissure.

The eye of the understanding is like the eye of the sense; for as you may see great objects through small crannies or holes, so you may see great axioms of nature through small and contemptible instances. Bacon's Natural History.

And therefore beat and laid about,
To find a cranny to creep out. Hudibras.

In a firm building, the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, but with brick or stone, fitted to the crannies. Dryden.

Within the soaking of water and springs, with streams and currents in the veins and crannies. Burnet's Theory.

He skipped from room to room, ran up stairs and down stairs, from the kitchen to the garrets, and he peeped into every cranny. Arbuthnot.

CRAPE, kråpe. n. s. [crepa, low Lat.] A thin stuff, loosely woven, of which the dress of the clergy is sometimes made.

And Proud Roxana, fir'd with jealous rage,
With fifty yards of crape shall sweep the stage. Swift.

To thee I often call'd in vain,
Against that assassin in crape. Swift

'Tis from high life high characters are drawn;
A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn. Pope.

CRA'PULENCE, kråp'pû-lêns. n. s. [crapula, a surfeit, Lat.] Drunkenness; sickness by intemperance. Dict.

CRA'PULOUS, kråp'û-lûs.[314] adj. [crapulosus, Lat.] Drunken; intemperate; sick with intemperance. Dict.

To CRASH, kråsh. v. n. [a word probably formed from the thing.] To make a loud complicated noise, as of many things falling or breaking at once.

There shall be a great crashing from the hills. Zeph. i. 10.

When convulsions cleave the lab'ring earth,
Before the dismal yawn appears, the ground
Trembles and heaves, the nodding houses crash. Smith.

To CRASH, kråsh. v. a. To break or bruise

My master is the great rich Capulet; and if you be not of the house of Montague, I pray you come and crash a cup of wine. Shakspeare.

Mr Warburton has it, crush a cup of wine.

To crash, says Hanmer, is to be merry: a crash being a word still used in some counties for a merry bout. It is surely better to read crack. See CRACK.

CRASH, kråsh. n. s. [from the verb.] A loud sudden mixed sound, as of many things broken at the same time.

Senseless Ilium,
Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops to his base; and, with a hideous crash, Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Moralizing sat I by the hazard-table: I looked upon the uncertainty of riches, the decay of beauty, and the crash of worlds, with as much contempt as ever Plato did Pope.

CRA'SIS, krå'sîs. n. s. [κρᾶσις.] Temperature; constitution arising from the various properties of humours.

The fancies of men are so immediately diversified by the individual crasis, that every man owns something wherein none is like him. Glanville.

A man may be naturally inclined to pride, lust, and anger; as these inclinations are founded in a peculiar crasis and constitution of the blood and spirits. South.

CRASS, krås. adj. [crassus, Lat.] Gross; coarse; not thin; not comminuted; not subtle; not consisting of small parts

Iron, in aquafortis, will fall into ebullition, with noise and emication; as also a crass and fumid exhalation, caused from the combat of the sulphur of iron with the acid and nitrous spirits of aquafortis Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Metals are intermixed with the common terrestrial matter, so as not to be discoverable by human industry; or, if discoverable, so diffused and scattered amongst the crasser and more unprofitable matter, that it would never be possible to separate and extract it. Woodward's Natural History.

CRA'SSITUDE, krås'sé-tûde n. s. [crassitudo, Lat.] Grossness; coarseness; thickness.

They must be but thin, as a leaf, or a piece of paper or parchment; for, if they have a greater crassitude, they will alter in their own body, though they spend not. Bacon.

The Dead Sea, which vomiteth up bitumen, is of that crassitude, as living bodies, bound hand and foot, cast into it, have been born up, and not sunk. Bacon's Natural History.

The terrestrial matter carried by rivers into the sea, is sustained therein partly by the greater crassitude and gravity of the sea-water, and partly by its constant agitation. Woodward.

CRASTINA'TION, krås-tê-nâ'shûn. n. s. [from cras, Lat. to-morrow.] Delay. Dict.

CRATCH, krâtsh. n. s. [creche, Fr. crates, Lat.] The palisaded frame in which hay is put for cattle.

When being expelled out of Paradise by reason of sin, thou wert held in the chains of death; I was inclosed in the virgin's womb, I was laid in the cratch, I was wrapped in swathling-cloaths. Hakewill on Providence.

CRAVA'T, krâ-vât'. n. s. [of uncertain etymology.] A neckcloth; any thing worn about the neck.

Less delinquents have been scourg'd,
And hemp on wooden anvils forg'd;
Which others for cravats have worn
About their necks, and took a turn. Hudibras.

The restrictives were applied, one over another, to her throat: then we put her on a cravat. Wiseman's Surgery.

To CRAVE, kråve. v. a. [cpapian, Sax.]

1. To ask with earnestness; to ask with submission; to beg; to entreat.

What one petition is there found in the whole Litany, whereof we shall ever be able at any time to say, that no man living needeth the grace or benefit therein craved at God's hands? Hooker.

As for my nobler friends, I crave their pardons;
But for the mutable rank-scented many,
Let them regard me as I do not flatter. Shakspeare.

The poor people, not knowing where to hide themselves from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to crave help, fled as men and women dismayed. Knolles.

I would crave leave here, under the word action, to comprehend the forbearance too of any action proposed. Locke.

Each ardent nymph the rising current craves,
Each shepherd's pray'r retards the parting waves. Prior.

2. To ask insatiably.

The subjects arm'd, the more their princes gave,
Th' advantage only took the more to crave. Denham.

Him dost thou mean, who, spite of all his store,
Is ever craving, and will still be poor?
Who cheats for halfpence, and who doffs his coat
To save a farthing in a ferry-boat? Dryden's Persius.

3. To long; to wish unreasonably.

Levity pushes us on from one vain desire to another, in a regular vicissitude and succession of cravings and satiety. L'Estrange.

He is actually under the power of a temptation, and the sway of an impetuous lust; both hurrying him to satisfy the cravings of it by some wicked action. South.

4. To call for importunately.

Bestow
Your needful counsel to our businesses,
Which crave the instant use. Shaksp. King Lear.

The antecedent concomitants and effects of such a constitution, are acids, taken in too great quantities; sour eructations, and a craving appetite, especially of terrestrial and absorbent substances. Arbuthnot.

5. Sometimes with for before the thing sought.

Once one may crave for love,
But more would prove
This heart too little, that too great. Suckling.

CRA'VEN, krå'vn.[103] n. s. [derived by Skinner from crave, as one that craves or begs his life: perhaps it comes originally from the noise made by a conquered cock.]

1. A cock conquered and dispirited.

What, is your crest a coxcomb?———
——A combless cock, so Kate will be my hen.
—No cock of mine; you crow too like a craven. Shakspeare.

2. A coward; a recreant; a weak-hearted spiritless fellow.

Is it fit this soldier keep his oath?
——He is a craven and a villain else. Shak.

CRA'VEN, krå'vn. adj. Cowardly; base.

Upon his coward breast
A bloody cross, and on his craven crest
A bunch of hairs discolour'd diversly. Spenser.

Whether it be
Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple,
Of thinking too precisely on th' event;
A thought which, quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom,
And ever three parts coward. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Yet if the innocent some mercy find,
From cowardice, not ruth, did that proceed;
His noble foes dust not his craven kind
Exasperate by such a bloody deed. Fairfax.

To CRA'VEN, krå'vn. v. a. [from the noun.] To make recreant or cowardly.

'Gainst self-slaughter
There is a prohibition so divine,
That cravens my weak hand. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

CRA'VER, krå'vûr. n. s. [from crave.] An insatiable asker. It is used in Clarissa.

To CRAUNCH, krântsh.[214] v. a. [schrantsen, Dut. whence the vulgar say more properly to scraunch.] To crush in the mouth. The word is used by Swift.

CRAW, krâw. n. s. [kroe, Dan.] The crop or first stomach of birds.

In birds there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but, in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallowed into the crop or craw, or at least into a kind of antestomach, which I have observed in many, especially piscivorous birds. Ray on the Creation.

CRA'WFISH, krâw'fish. n. s. [sometimes written crayfish, properly crevice; in Fr. ecrevisse.] A small crustaceous fish found in brooks; the small lobster of fresh water.

Those that cast their shell are the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, the hodmandod or dodman, and the tortoise. Bacon.

Let me to crack live crawfish recommend. Pope.

The common crawfish, and the large sea crawfish, both produce the stones called crabs eyes. Hill.

To CRAWL, krâwl. v. n. [krielen, Dut.]

1. To creep; to move with a slow motion; to move without rising from the ground, as a worm.

I saw them under a green mantling vine,
That crawls along the side of yon small hill. Milton.

That crawling insect, who from mud began;
Warm'd by my beams, and kindled into man! Dryden.

The streams, but just contain'd within their bounds,

By slow degrees into their channels crawl;
And earth increases as the waters fall. Dryden.

A worm finds what it searches after, only by feeling, as it crawls from one thing to another. Grew.

The vile worm, that yesterday began
To crawl; thy fellow-creature, abject man. Prior.

2. To move weakly and slowly, or timorously.

'Tis our first intent
To shake all cares and business from our age,
While we unburthen'd crawl tow'rd death. Shaksp.

They like tall fellows crept out of the holes; and secretly crawling up the battered walls of the fort, got into it. Knolles.

For the fleets of Solomon and the kings of Egypt, it is very apparent they went with great leisure, and crawled close by the shore-side. Heylyn.

A look so pale no quartane ever gave;
Thy dwindled legs seem crawling to a grave.
Dryden's Juvenal.

He was hardly able to crawl about the room, far less to look after a troublesome business. Arbuth.

Man is a very worm by birth,
Vile reptile, weak and vain!
A while he crawls upon the earth,
Then shrinks to earth again. Pope.

It will be very necessary for the threadbare gownman, and every child who can crawl, to watch the fields at harvest-time. Swift.

3. To advance slowly and slily.

Cranmer
Hath crawl'd into the favour of the king,
And is his oracle. Shakspeare's Henry VIII.

4. To move about hated and despised.

Reflect upon that litter of absurd opinions that crawl about the world, to the disgrace of reason. South.

How will the condemned sinner then crawl forth, and appear in his filth, before that undefiled tribunal? South.

Behold a rev'rend sire, whom want of grace
Has made the father of a nameless race,
Crawl through the street, shov'd on, or rudely press'd
By his own sons, that pass him by unbless'd! Pope.

CRA'WLER, kràw'lůr. n. s. [from crawl.] A creeper; any thing that creeps.

CRA'YFISH, kràw'fĭsh. n. s. [See CRAWFISH.] The river lobster.

The cure of the muriatick and armoniack saltness requires slimy meats; as snails, tortoises, jellies, and crayfishes. Floyer.

CRA'YON, krà'ůn. n. s. [crayon, Fr.]

1. A kind of pencil; a roll of paste to draw lines with.

Let no day pass over you without drawing a line; that is to say, without working, without giving some strokes of the pencil or the crayon. Dryden.

2. A drawing or design done with a pencil or crayon.

To CRAZE, kràze. v. a. [ecraser, Fr. to break to pieces.]

1. To break; to crush; to weaken.

In this consideration, the answer of Calvin unto Farrel, concerning the children of popish parents, doth seemed crazed. Hooker.

Relent, sweet Hermia; and, Lysander, yield
Thy crazed title to my certain right. Shakspeare.

Till length of years,
And sedentary numbness, craze my limbs. Milton.

Then through the fiery pillar, and the cloud,
God looking forth will trouble all his host,
And craze their chariot wheels. Milton.

2. To powder.

The tin ore passeth to the crazing mill, which, between two grinding stones, bruiseth it to a fine sand. Carew's Survey.

3. To crack the brain; to impair the intellect.

I lov'd him, friend,
No father his son dearer, true, to tell thee,
That grief hath craz'd my wits, Shak. King Lear.

Wickedness is a kind of voluntary frenzy, and a chosen distraction; and every sinner does wilder and more extravagant things than any man can do that is crazed and out of his wits; only with this sad difference, that he knows better what he does. Tillotson.

CRA'ZEDNESS, krà'zĕd-nĕs.[365] n. s. [from crazed.] Decrepitude; brokenness; diminution of intellect.

The nature, as of men that have sick bodies, so likewise of the people in the crazedness of their minds, possessed with dislike and discontentment at things present, is to imagine that any thing would help them. Hooker.

CRA'ZINESS, krà'zè-nĕs. n. s. [from crazy.]

1. State of being crazy; imbecility; weakness.

Touching other places, she may be said to hold them as one should do a wolf by the ears; nor will I speak now of the craziness of her title to many of them. Howell's Vocal Forest.

2. Weakness of intellect.

CRA'ZY, krà'zè. adj. [ecrazé, Fr.]

1. Broken; decrepit.

Come, my lord,
We will bestow you in some better place,
Fitter for sickness and for crazy age. Shakspeare.

When people are crazy, and in disorder, it is natural for them to groan. L'Estrange.

2. Broken-witted; shattered in the intellect.

The queen of night, whose large command
Rules all the sea and half the land,
And over moist and crazy brains,
In high spring-tides, at midnight reigns. Hudibras.

3. Weak; feeble; shattered

Physick can but mend our crazy state,
Patch an old building, not a new create. Dryden.

Were it possible that the near approaches of eternity, whether by a mature age, a crazy constitution, or a violent sickness, should amaze so many, had they duly considered. Wake.

CREAGHT, krâte. n. s. [An Irish word.]

In these fast places, they kept their creaghts, or herds of cattle, living by the milk of the cow, without husbandry or tillage. Davies on Ireland.

To CREAGHT, krâte. v. n.

It was made penal to the English to permit the Irish to creaght or graze upon their lands, or present them to ecclesiastical benefices. Davies.

To CREAK, krèke. v. n. [corrupted from crack.]

1. To make a harsh protracted noise.

Let not the creaking of shoes, nor the rustling of silks, betray thy poor heart to women. Shaksp.

No door there was th' unguarded house to keep,
On creaking hinges turn'd, to break his sleep.
Dryden.

2. It is sometimes used of animals.

The creaking locusts with my voice conspire,
They fried with heat, and I with fierce desire.
Dryden.

CREAM, krème. n. s. [cremor, Lat.]

1. The unctuous or oily part of milk, which, when it is cold, floats on the top, and is changed by the agitation of the churn into butter; the flower of milk.

It is not your inky brows, your black silk hair,
Your bugle eye-balls, nor your cheek of cream,
That can entame my spirits to your worship.
Shakspeare.

I am as vigilant as a cat to steal cream. Shaksp.

Cream is matured and made to rise speedily, by putting in cold water, which, as it seemeth, getteth down the whey. Bacon's Natural History.

How the drudging goblin swet,
To earn his cream-bowl duly set;
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath thresh'd the corn. Milton.

Let your various creams incircled be
With swelling fruit, just ravish'd from the tree.
King.

Milk, standing some time, naturally separates into an oily liquor called cream; and a thinner, blue, and more ponderous liquor, called skimmed milk. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. It is used for the best part of any thing: as, the cream of a jest.

To CREAM, krème. v. n. [from the noun.] To gather cream.

There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do cream and mantle like a standing pond;
And do a wilful stiffness entertain,
With purpose to be drest in an opinion
Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit. Shaksp.

To CREAM, krème. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To skim off the cream.

2. To take the flower and quintessence of any thing: so used somewhere by Swift.

CREAM-FACED, krème'fâste. adj. [cream and faced.] Pale; coward-looking.

Thou cream-fac'd loun,
Where got'st thou that goose-look? Shaksp.

CRE'ANCE, krè'ânse. n. s. [Fr.] Is, in falconry, a fine small line, fastened to a hawk's leash when she is first lured.

CREASE, krèse.[427] n. s. [from creta, Lat. chalk. Skinner.] A mark made by doubling any thing.

Men of great parts are unfortunate in business, because they go out of the common road: I once desired lord Bolingbroke to observe, that the clerks used an ivory knife, with a blunt edge, to divide paper, which cut it even, only requiring a strong hand; whereas a sharp penknife would go out of the crease, and disfigure the paper. Swift.

To CREASE, krèse. v. a. [from the noun.] To mark any thing by doubling it, so as to leave the impression.

To CREA'TE, krè-âte'. v. a. [creo, Lat.]

1. To form out of nothing; to cause to exist.

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. Genesis.

We having but imperfect ideas of the operations of our minds, and much imperfecter yet of the operations of God, run into great difficulties about free created agents, which reason cannot well extricate itself out of. Locke.

2. To produce; to cause; to be the occasion of.

Now is the time of help: your eye in Scotland
Would create soldiers, and make women fight.
Shakspeare.

His abilities were prone to create in him great confidence of undertakings, and this was like enough to betray him to great errours and many enemies. King Charles.

They eclipse the clearest truths by difficulties of their own creating, or no man could miss his way to heaven for want of light. Decay of Piety.

None knew, till guilt created fear,
What darts or poison'd arrows were. Roscommon.

Must I new bars to my own joy create,
Refuse myself what I had forc'd from fate? Dryden.

Long abstinence is troublesome to acid constitutions, by the uneasiness it creates in the stomach. Arbuthnot.

3. To beget.

And the issue there create
Ever shall be fortunate. Shaksp.

4. To invest with any new character.

Arise, my knights o' th' battle: I create you

Companions to our person, and will fit you
With dignities becoming your estates. Shaksp.

5. To give any new qualities; to put any thing in a new state.

The best British undertaker had but a proportion of three thousand acres for himself, with power to create a manor, and hold a court-baron. Davies.

CREA'TION, krė-à'shûn. n. s. [from create.]

1. The act of creating or conferring existence.

Consider the immensity of the Divine Love, expressed in all the emanations of his providence; in his creation, in his conservation of us. Taylor.

2. The act of investing with new qualities or character; as, the creation of peers.

3. The things created; the universe.

As subjects then the whole creation came,
And from their natures Adam them did name. Denham.

Such was the saint, who shone with ev'ry grace,
Reflecting, Moses-like, his master's face:
God saw his image lively was express'd,
And his own work as his creation bless'd. Dryden.

Nor could the tender new creation bear
Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year. Dryd.

In days of yore, no matter where or when,
Before the low creation swarm'd with men. Parnel.

4. Any thing produced, or caused.

Art thou not, fatal vision, sensible
To feeling as to sight? Or art thou but
A dagger of the mind, a false creation,
Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain? Shaksp.

CREA'TIVE, krė-à'tiv.[167] adj. [from create.]

1. Having the power to create.

But come, ye generous minds, in whose wide thought,
Of all his works, creative beauty burns
With warmest beam. Thomson's Spring.

2. Exerting the act of creation.

To trace the outgoings of the ancient of days in the first instance, and of his creative power, is a research too great for mortal inquiry. South.

CREA'TOR, krė-à'tûr.[166] n. s. [creator, Lat.] The being that bestows existence.

Open, ye heavens, your living doors; let in
The great creator, from his work return'd
Magnificent; his six days work, a world. Milton.

When you lie down, close your eyes with a short prayer, commit yourself into the hands of your faithful creator; and when you have done, trust him with yourself, as you must do when you are dying. Taylor's Guide to Devotion.

CRE'ATURE, krė'tshûre.[461] [462] n. s. [creatura, low Lat.]

1. A being not self-existent, but created by the supreme power.

Were these persons idolaters for the worship they did not give to the creator, or for the worship they did give to his creatures? Stillingfleet.

2. Any thing created.

God's first creature was light. Bacon's New. Atl.

Imperfect the world, and all the creatures in it, must be acknowledged in many respects to be. Tillotson.

3. An animal, not human.

The queen pretended satisfaction of her knowledge only in killing creatures vile, as cats and dogs. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

4. A general term for man.

Yet crime in her could never creature find;
But for his love, and for her own self sake,
She wander'd had from one to other Ind. Spenser

Most cursed of all creatures under sky,
Lo, Tantalus, I here tormented lie. Spenser.

Though he might burst his lungs to call for help,
No creature would assist or pity him. Roscommon

5. A word of contempt for a human being.

Hence! home, you idle creatures, get you home:
Is this a holiday? Shaksp. Julius Cæsar.

He would into the stews,
And from the common creatures pluck a glove,
And wear it as a favour. Shaksp. Richard III.

I've heard that guilty creatures, at a play,
Have, by the very cunning of the scene,
Been struck so to the soul, that presently
They have proclaim'd their malefactions. Shaksp.

Nor think to-night of thy ill nature,
But of thy follies, idle creature. Prior.

A good poet no sooner communicates his works, but it is imagined he is a vain young creature, given up to the ambition of fame. Pope.

6. A word of petty tenderness.

And then, Sir, would he gripe and wring my hand;
Cry, Oh sweet creature! and then kiss me hard. Shaksp.

Ah, cruel creature, whom dost thou despise?
The gods, to live in woods, have left the skies. Dryden's Virgil.

Some young creatures have learnt their letters and syllables by having them pasted upon little tablets. Watts.

7. A person who owes his rise or his fortune to another.

He sent to colonel Massey to send him men, which he, being a creature of Essex's, refused. Clarendon.

The duke's creature he desired to be esteemed. Clarendon.

To justify their grace, their creatures praise. Dryd.

The design was discovered by a person whom every body knows to be the creature of a certain great man. Swift.

CRE'ATURELY, krė'tshûre-lė. adj. [from creature.] Having the qualities of a creature.

The several parts of relatives, or creaturely infinites, may have finite proportions to one another. Cheyne's Philosophical Principles.

CRE'BRITUDE, krė'brė-tûde. n. s. [from creber, frequent, Lat.] Frequentness. Dict.

CRE'BROUS, krė'brûs. adj. [from creber, Lat.] Frequent. Dict.

CRE'DENCE, krė'dênse. n. s. [from credo, Lat. credence, Norman Fr.]

1. Belief; credit.

Ne let it seem that credence this exceeds,
For he that made the same was known right well
To have done much more admirable deeds;
It Merlin was. Spenser.

Love and wisdom,
Approv'd so to your majesty, may plead
For ample credence. Shaksp.

They did not only underhand give out that this was the true earl; but the friar, finding some credence in the people, took boldness in the pulpit to declare as much. Bacon.

2. That which gives a claim to credit or belief.

After they had delivered to the king their letters of credence, they were led to a chamber richly furnished. Hayward.

CREDE'NDA, krė-dên'dâ. n. s. [Lat.] Things to be believed; articles of faith: distinguished in theology from agenda, or practical duties.

These were the great articles and credenda of Christianity, that so much startled the world. South.

CRE'DENT, krė'dênt. adj. [credens, Lat.]

1. Believing; easy of belief.

Then weigh what loss your honour may sustain,
If with too credent ear you list' his songs. Shaksp.

2. Having credit; not to be questioned. Less proper.

My authority bears a credent bulk,
That no particular scandal once can touch,
But it confounds the breather. Shakspeare.

CREDE'NTIAL, krė-dên'shâl. n. s. [from credens, Lat.] That which gives a title to credit; the warrant upon which belief or authority is claimed.

A few persons of an odious and despised country could not have filled the world with believers, had they not shewn undoubted credentials from the Divine Person who sent them on such a message. Addison.

CREDIBI'LITY, krėd-ė-bil'ė-tė. n. s. [from credible.] Claim to credit; possibility of obtaining belief; probability.

The first of those opinions I shall shew to be altogether incredible, and the latter to have all the credibility and evidence of which a thing of that nature is capable. Tillotson.

Calculate the several degrees of credibility and conviction, by which the one evidence surpasseth the other. Atterbury.

CRE'DIBLE, krėd'ė-bl.[405] adj. [credibilis, Lat.] Worthy of credit; deserving of belief; having a just claim to belief.

The ground of credit is the credibility of things credited; and things are made credible, either by the known condition and quality of the utterer, or by the manifest likelihood of truth in themselves. Hooker.

None can demonstrate to me, that there is such an island as Jamaica; yet, upon the testimony of credible persons, I am free from doubt. Tillotson.

CRE'DIBLENESS, krėd'ė-bl-nės. n. s. [from credible.] Credibility; worthiness of belief; just claim to belief.

The credibleness of a good part of these narratives has been confirmed to me by a practiser of physick. Boyle.

CRE'DIBLY, krėd'ė-blė. adv. [from credible.] In a manner that claims belief.

This, with the loss of so few of the English as is scarce credible; being, as hath been rather confidently than credibly reported, but of one man, though not a few hurt. Bacon.

CRE'DIT, krėd'it. n. s. [credit, Fr.]

1. Belief of; faith yielded to another.

When the people heard these words, they gave no credit unto them, nor received them. 1 Mac. x. 46.

I may give credit to reports. Addison's Spectator.

Some secret truths, from learn'd pride conceal'd,
To maids alone and children are reveal'd:
What though no credit doubting wits may give,
The fair and innocent shall still believe. Pope.

2. Honour; reputation.

I published, because I was told I might please such as it was a credit to please. Pope.

3. Esteem; good opinion.

There is no decaying merchant, or inward beggar, hath so many tricks to uphold the credit of their wealth, as these empty persons have to maintain the credit of their sufficiency. Bacon.

His learning, though a poet said it,
Before a play, would lose no credit. Swift.

Yes, while I live, no rich or noble knave
Shall walk the world in credit to his grave. Pope.

4. Faith; testimony; that which procures belief.

We are contented to take this upon your credit, and to think it may be. Hooker.

The things which we properly believe, be only such as are received upon the credit of divine testimony. Hooker.

The author would have done well to have left so great a paradox only to the credit of a single assertion. Locke.

5. Trust reposed, with regard to property; correlative to debt.

Credit is nothing but the expectation of money, within some limited time. Locke.

6. Promise given.

They have never thought of violating the publick credit, or of alienating the revenues to other uses than to what they have been thus assigned. Addison.

7. Influence; power not compulsive; interest.

She employed his uttermost credit to relieve us, which was as great as a beloved son with a mother. Sidney.

They sent him likewise a copy of their supplication to the king, and desired him to use his credit that a treaty might be entered into. Clarendon.

Having credit enough with his master to provide for his own interest, he troubled not himself for that of other men. Clarendon.

To CRE'DIT, krĕd'ît. v. a. [credo, Lat.]

1. To believe.

Now I change my mind,
And partly credit things that do presage. Shaksp.

To credit the unintelligibility both of this union and motion, we need no more than to consider it. Glanville.

2. To procure credit or honour to any thing.

May here her monument stand so,
To credit this rude age; and show
To future times, that even we
Some patterns did of virtue see. Waller.

It was not upon design to credit these papers, nor to compliment a society so much above flattery. Glanville.

At present you credit the church as much by your government, as you did the school formerly by your wit. South.

3. To trust; to confide in.

4. To admit as a debtor.

CRE'DITABLE, krĕd'ît-â-bl. adj. [from credit.]

2. Honourable; estimable.

The contemplation of things, that do not serve to promote our happiness, is but a more specious sort of idleness, a more pardonable and creditable kind of ignorance. Tillotson.

CRE'DITABLENESS, krĕd'ît-â-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from creditable.] Reputation; estimation.

Among all these snares, there is none more entangling than the creditableness and repute of customary vices. Decay of Piety.

CRE'DITABLY, krĕd'ît-â-blĕ. adv. [from creditable.] Reputably; without disgrace.

Many will chuse rather to neglect their duty safely and creditably, than to get a broken pate in the church's service, only to be rewarded with that which will break their hearts too. South.

CRE'DITOR, krĕd'ît-tûr.[166] n. s. [creditor, Lat.]

1. He to whom a debt is owed; he that gives credit: correlative to debtor.

There came divers of Antonio's creditors in my company to Venice, that swear he cannot chuse but break. Shaksp.

I am so used to consider myself as creditor and debtor, that I often state my accounts after the same manner, with regard to heaven and my own soul. Addison's Spectator.

No man of honour, as that word is usually understood, did ever pretend that his honour obliged him to be chaste or temperate, to pay his creditors, to be useful to his country, to do good to mankind, to endeavour to be wise or learned, to regard his word, his promise, or his oath. Swift.

2. One who credits; one who believes. Not used.

Many sought to feed
The easy creditors of novelties,
By voicing him alive. Shaksp.

The poor Plangus, being subject to that only disadvantage of honest hearts, credulity, was persuaded by him. Sidney.

The prejudice of credulity may, in some measure, be cured, by learning to set a high value on truth. Watts's Logick.

CRE'DULOUS, krĕd'jû-lûs.[367] [293] adj. [credulus, Lat.] Apt to believe; unsuspecting; easily deceived.

A credulous father, and a brother noble,
Whose nature is so far from doing harm,
That he suspects none. Shaksp. King Lear.

Who now enjoys thee credulous all gold,
Who always vacant, always amiable,
Hopes thee, of flattery gales
Unmindful, hapless he,
T' whom thou untry'd seem'st fair. Milton.

CRE'DULOUSNESS, krĕd'jû-lûs-nĕs. n. s. [from credulous.] Aptness to believe; credulity.

CREED, krēēd. n. s. [from credo, the first word of the apostle's creed.]

1. A form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended.

The larger and fuller view of this foundation is set down in the creeds of the church. Hammond.

Will they, who decry creeds and creedmakers, say that one who writes a treatise of morality ought not to make in it any collection of moral precepts? Fiddes's Sermons.

2. Any solemn profession of principles or opinion.

For me, my lords,
I love him not, nor fear him; there's my creed. Shakspeare.

To CREEK, krēēk. v. a. [See To CREAK.] To make a harsh noise.

Shall I stay here,
Creeking my shoes on the plain masonry? Shaksp.

CREEK, krēēk.[246] n. s. [cpecca, Sax. kreke, Dut.]

1. A prominence or jut in a winding coast.

As streams, which with their winding banks do play,
Stopp'd by their creeks, run softly through the plain. Davies.

They on the bank of Jordan, by a creek,
Where winds with reeds and oziers whisp'ring play,
Their unexpected loss and plaints outbreath'd. Milton.

2. A small port; a bay; a cove.

A law was made here to stop their passage in every port and creek. Davies on Ireland.

3. Any turn, or alley.

A back-friend, a shoulder-clapper; one that commands the passages of alleys, creeks, and narrow lands. Shakspeare.

CRE'EKY, krēē'kĕ. adj. [from creek.] Full of creeks; unequal; winding.

Who, leaning on the belly of a pot,
Pour'd forth a water, whose outgushing flood
Run bathing all the creeky shore a-flot,
Whereon the Trojan prince spilt Turnus' blood. Spenser.

To CREEP, krēēp.[246] v. n. pret. crept. [cpỳpan, Sax. krepan, Germ.]

1. To move with the belly to the ground, without legs, as a worm.

Ye that walk
The earth, and stately tread, or lowly creep! Milt.
And every creeping thing that creeps the ground. Milton.

If they cannot distinguish creeping from flying, let them lay down Virgil, and take up Ovid de Ponto. Dryden.

2. To grow along the ground, or on other supports.

The grottos cool, with shady poplars crown'd,
And creeping vines on arbours weav'd around. Dryden.

3. To move forward without bounds or leaps, as insects.

4. To move slowly and feebly.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time. Shakspeare.

Why should a man
Sleep when he wakes, and creep into the jaundice
By being peevish? Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

He who creeps after plain, dull, common sense, is safe from committing absurdities, but can never reach the excellence of wit. Dryden.

5. To move secretly and clandestinely.

I'll creep up into the chimney.——

—There they always use to discharge their birding-pieces: creep into the kiln-hole. Shaksp.

Whate'er you are,
That in this desart inaccessible,
Under the shade of melancholy boughs,
Lose and neglect the creeping hours of time. Shaksp.

Of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women. 2 Tim. iii. 6.

Thou makest darkness, and it is night wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. Psalm civ. 20.

Now and then a work or two has crept in, to keep his first design in countenance. Atterbury.

6. To move timorously without soaring, or venturing into dangers.

Paradise Lost is admirable; but am I therefore bound to maintain, that there are no flats amongst his elevations, when it is evident he creeps along sometimes for above an hundred lines together? Dryden.

We here took a little boat, to creep along the seashore as far as Genoa. Addison on Italy.

7. To come unexpected; to steal forward unheard and unseen.

By those gifts of nature and fortune he creeps, nay he flies, into the favour of poor silly women. Sidney.

For I am nothing, if not critical. Shaksp. Othello.

4. [from crisis.] Comprising the time at which a great event is determined.

The moon is supposed to be measured by sevens, and the critical or decretory days to be dependent on that number. Brown's Vulg. Err.

5. Decisive; nice.

Opportunity is in respect to time, in some sense, as time is in respect to eternity: it is the small moment, the exact point, the critical minute, on which every good work so much depends. Spratt.

The people cannot but resent to see their apprehensions of the power of France, in so critical a juncture, wholly laid aside. Swift.

6. Producing a crisis or change of the disease: as, a critical sweat.

CRI'TICALLY, krît'ê-kâl-ê. adv. [from critical.]

1. In a critical manner; exactly; curiously.

Difficult it is to understand the purity of English, and critically to discern good writers from bad, and a proper stile from a corrupt one. Dryden.

These shells which are digged up out of the earth, several hundreds of which I now keep by me, have been nicely and critically examined by very many learned men. Woodward.

2. At the exact point of time.

CRI'TICALNESS, krît'ê-kâl-nês. n. s. [from critical.] Exactness; accuracy; nicety; incidence at a particular point of time.

To CRI'TICISE, krît'ê-size.[163] v. n. [from critick.]

1. To play the critick; to judge; to write remarks upon any performance of literature; to point out faults and beauties.

They who can criticise so weakly, as to imagine I have done my worst, may be convinced, at their own cost, that I can write severely with more ease than I can gently. Dryden.

Know well each ancient's proper character;
Without all this at once before your eyes,
Cavil you may, but never criticise. Pope.

2. To animadvert upon as faulty.

Nor would I have his father look so narrowly into these accounts, as to take occasion from thence to criticise on his expences. Locke.

To CRI'TICISE, krît'ê-size. v. a. [from critick.] To censure; to pass judgment upon.

Nor shall I look upon it as any breach of charity, to criticise the author, so long as I keep clear of the person. Addison.

CRI'TICISM, krît'ê-sîzm. n. s. [from critick.]

1. Criticism, as it was first instituted by Aristotle, was meant a standard of judging well. Dryden.

2. Remark; animadversion; critical observations.

There is not a Greek or Latin critick, who has not shewn, even in the style of his criticisms, that he was master of all the eloquence and delicacy of his native tongue. Addison.

To CROAK, króke. v. n. [cnacezzan, Sax. crocare, Ital. crocitare, Lat.]

1. To make a hoarse low noise, like a frog.

The subtle swallow flies about the brook,
And querulous frogs in muddy pools do croak.
May's Virgil.

So when Jove's block descended from on high,

Loud thunder to its bottom shook the bog,
And the hoarse nation croak'd. Pope.
Blood, stuff'd in skins, is British christians food;
And France robs marshes of the croaking brood.
Gay.

2. To caw, or cry like a raven or crow.

The raven himself is hoarse,
That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan
Under my battlements. Shaksp.
The hoarse raven, on the blasted bough,
By croaking from the left, presag'd the coming blow. Dryden.
At the same time the walk of elms, with the croaking of the ravens, looks exceeding solemn and venerable. Addison.

3. It may be used in contempt for any disagreeable or offensive murmur.

Their understandings are but little instructed, when all their whole time and pains is laid out to still the croaking of their own bellies. Locke.

CROAK, krōke. n. s. [from the verb.] The cry or voice of a frog or raven.

The swallow skims the river's watry face;
The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious race. Dryden.
Was that a raven's croak, or my son's voice?
No matter which, I'll to the grave and hide me. Lee.

It is covered with very hard scales, which cannot without great difficulty, be pierced; except under the belly, where the skin is tender. It has a wide throat, with several rows of teeth, sharp and separated, which enter one another. It runs with great swiftness; but does not easily turn itself. It is long lived, and is said to grow continually to its death. Some are fifteen or eighteen cubits long. Crocodiles lay their eggs, resembling goose-eggs, sometimes amounting to sixty, near the waterside, covering them with the sand, that the heat of the sun may hatch them. Calmet.

Gloster's show
Beguiles him; as the mournful crocodile
With sorrow snares relenting passengers. Shaksp.
Crocodiles were thought to be peculiar unto the Nile. Brown's Vulgar Errours.
Cæsar will weep, the crocodile will weep. Dryden.
Enticing crocodiles, whose tears are death;
Syrens, that murder with enchanting breath. Granville.

Crocodile is also a little animal, otherwise called stinx, very much like the lizard, or small crocodile. It lives by land and water; has four short small legs, a very sharp muzzle, and a short small tail. It is pretty enough to look at, being covered all over with little scales of the colour of silver, intermixed with brown, and of a gold colour upon the back. It always remains little. Farrour.

Aye, crookback, here I stand to answer thee,
Or any he the proudest of thy sort. Shak. Hen. VI.

CRO'OKBACKED, krŏŏk'bākt.[359] adj. Having bent shoulders.

A dwarf as well may for a giant pass,
As negroe for a swan; a crookback'd lass
Be call'd Europa. Dryden's Juvenal.
There are millions of truths that a man is not, or may not think himself concerned to know; as, whether our king Richard III. was crookbacked or no. Locke.

CROO'KED,[366] krŏŏk'ĕd. adj. [crocher, Fr.]

1. Bent; not straight; curved.

A bell or a cannon may be heard beyond a hill which intercepts the sight of the sounding body, and sounds are propagated as readily through crooked pipes, as through straight ones. Newton.
Mathematicians say of a straight line, that it is as well an index of its own rectitude as of the obliquity of a crooked one. Woodward.

2. Winding; oblique; anfractuous.

A man shall never want crooked paths to walk in, if he thinks that he is in the right way, wherever he has the footsteps of others to follow. Locke.
Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge,
The glow-worm lights his gem. Thomson.

3. Perverse; untoward; without rectitude of mind; given to obliquity of conduct.

They have corrupted themselves: they are a perverse and crooked generation. Deut. xxx. 5.

1. The highest part or end of any thing; as the head of a tree, the ear of corn.

2. The harvest; the corn gathered off a field; the product of the field;

And this of all my harvest hope I have,
Nought reaped but a weedy crop of care. Spenser.

Lab'ring the soil, and reaping plenteous crop,
Corn, wine, and oil. Milton's Par. Lost.

The fountain which from Helicon proceeds,
That sacred stream, should never water weeds,
Nor make the crop of thorns and thistles grow.
Roscommon.

Nothing is more prejudicial to your crop than mowing of it too soon. Mortimer's Husbandry.

3. Any thing cut off.

Guiltless of steel, and from the razor free,
It falls a plenteous crop reserv'd for thee. Dryden.

To CROP, krŏp. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cut off the ends of any thing; to mow; to reap; to lop.

Cropp'd are the flower-de-luces in your arms;
Of England's coat, one half is cut away. Shaksp.

He, upon whose side
The fewest roses are cropp'd from the tree,
Shall yield the other in the right opinion. Shaksp.

All the budding honours on thy crest
I'll crop, to make a garland for my head. Shaksp.

I will crop off from the top of his young twigs a tender one, and will plant it upon an high mountain. Ezekiel, xvii. 22.

There are some tears of trees, which are combed from the beards of goats; for when the goats bite and crop them, especially in the mornings, the dew being on, the tear cometh forth, and hangeth upon their beards. Bacon's Natural Hist.

No more, my goats, shall I behold you climb
The steepy cliffs, or crop the flow'ry thyme!
Dryden's Virgil.

2. To gather before it falls.

O fruit divine!
Sweet of thyself, but much more sweet thus cropp'd.
Milton.

Age, like ripe apples, on earth's bosom drops;
While force our youth, like fruits, untimely crops.
Denham.

Death destroys
The parent's hopes, and crops the growing boys.
Creech.

To CROP, krŏp. v. n. To yield harvest.

Royal wench!
She made great Cæsar lay his sword to-bed;
He plough'd her, and she cropt.
Shaksp. Antony and Cleopatra.

CRO'PPER, krŏp'pŭr. n. s. [from crop.] A kind of pigeon with a large crop.

I wanted weight of feeble Moors upon me,
To crush my soul out. Dryden's Don Sebastian.

2. To press with violence.

You speak him far——
——I don't extend him, Sir: within himself
Crush him together, rather than unfold
His measure fully. Shakspeare's Cymbeline.

When loud winds from diff'rent quarters rush,
Vast clouds encount'ring one another crush. Waller.

3. To overwhelm; to beat down.

Put in their hands thy bruising irons of wrath,
That they may crush down, with a heavy fall,
Th' usurping helmets of our adversaries! Shaksp

Vain is the force of man, and heav'n's as vain,
To crush the pillars which the pile sustain. Dryden.

4. To subdue; to conquer beyond resistance.

They use them to plague their enemies, or to oppress and crush some of their own too stubborn freeholders. Spenser on Ireland.

Mine emulation
Hath not that honour in 't it had; for
I thought to crush him in an equal force,
True sword to sword. Shakspeare's Coriolanus

This act
Shall bruise the head of Satan, crush his strength,
Defeating sin and death, his two main arms.
Milton.

What can that man fear, who takes care to please a Being that is so able to crush all his adversaries? a Being that can divert any misfortune from befalling him, or turn any such misfortune to his advantage? Addison's Guardian.

To CRUSH, krûsh. v. n. To be condensed; to come in a close body.

CRUSH, krûsh. n. s. [from the verb.] A collision; the act of rushing together.

Thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,

The wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds.
Addison's Cato.

CRUST, krûst. n. s. [crusta, Lat.]

1. Any shell, or external coat, by which any body is enveloped.

I have known the statue of an emperor quite hid under a crust of dross. Addison on Medals.

2. An incrustation; collection of matter into a hard body.

Were the river a confusion of never so many different bodies, if they had been all actually dissolved, they would at least have formed one continued crust; as we see the scorium of metals always gathers into a solid piece. Addison on Italy.

The viscous crust stops the entry of the chyle into the lacteals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The case of a pie, made of meal, and baked.

He was never suffered to go abroad, for fear of catching cold; when he should have been hunting down a buck, he was by his mother's side, learning how to season it, or put it in crust. Addison.

4. The outer hard part of bread.

Th' impenetrable crust thy teeth defies,
And, petrified with age, securely lies. Dryden.

5. A waste piece of bread.

Y' are liberal now; but when your turn is sped,
You 'll wish me choak'd with every crust of bread.
Dryden.

Men will do tricks, like dogs, for crusts. L'Estrange.

To CRUST, krûst. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To envelop; to cover with a hard case.

Why gave you me a monarch's soul,
And crushed it with base plebeian clay? Dryden.

Nor is it improbable but that, in process of time, the whole surface of it may be crusted over, as the islands enlarge themselves, and the banks close in upon them. Addison on Italy.

And now their legs, and breasts, and bodies stood Crusted with bark, and hard'ning into wood. Addison.

In some, who have run up to men without education, we may observe many great qualities darkened and eclipsed; their minds are crusted over, like diamonds in the rock. Felton.

2. Sturdy; morose; snappish; a low word.

CRUTCH, krůtsh. n. s. [croccia, Ital. croce, Fr. crucke, Ger.]

1. A support used by cripples.

Ah, thus king Henry throws away his crutch,
Before his legs be firm to bear his body. Shaksp.
Hence, therefore, thou nice crutch;
A scaly gauntlet now, with joints of steel,
Must glove this hand. Shaksp. Henry IV.

On these new crutches let them learn to walk. Dryden's Georgicks.

This fair defect, this helpless aid call'd wife,
The bending crutch of a decrepit life. Dryden.

Rhyme is a crutch that lifts the weak along,
Supports the feeble, but retards the strong. Smith.

The dumb shall sing, the lame his crutch forego,
And leap exulting like the bounding roe. Pope.

2. It is used for old age.

Beauty doth varnish age, as if new born,
And gives the crutch the cradle's infancy. Shak.

To CRUTCH, krůtsh. v. a. [from crutch.] To support on crutches as a cripple.

I hasten Og and Doeg to rehearse,
Two fools that crutch their feeble sense on verse. Dry.

To CRY, krī. v. n. [crier, Fr.]

1. To speak with vehemence and loudness.

4. To proclaim; to make publick.

Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem. Jeremiah.

5. To exclaim.

Yet let them look they glory not in mischief,
Nor build their evils on the graves of great men,
For then my guiltless blood must cry against them.
Shakspeare.

What's the matter,
That in the several places of the city
You cry against the noble senate? Shakspeare.

If dressing, mistressing, and compliment,
Take up thy day, the sun himself will cry
Against thee. Herbert

Lysimachus having obtained the favour of seeing his ships and machines, surprised at the contrivance, cried out, that they were built with more than human art. Arbuthnot on Coins.

6. To utter lamentations.

We came crying hither.
Thou know'st, the first time that we smell the air,
We wawle and cry. Shakspeare's King Lear.

Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart; but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit. Isaiah, lxv. 14.

When any evil has been upon philosophers, they groan as pitifully, and cry out as loud, as other men. Tillotson.

7. To squall as an infant.

Should some god tell me, that I should be born,
And cry again, his offer I should scorn. Denham.

Thus, in a starry night, fond children cry
For the rich spangles that adorn the sky. Waller.

He struggles first for breath, and cries for aid;
Then helpless in his mother's lap is laid. Dryden.

The child certainly knows, that the worm-seed or mustard-seed it refuses, is not the apple or sugar it cries for. Locke.

8. To weep; to shed tears.

Her who still weeps with spungy eyes,
And her who is dry cork, and never cries. Donne.

9. To utter an inarticulate voice, as an animal.

He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry. Psalm cxlvii. 9.

The beasts of the field cry also unto thee. Joel, i. 20.

10. To yelp, as a hound on the scent.

He cried upon it at the meerest loss;
Trust me I take him for the better dog. Shaksp.

To CRY, krī. v. a. To proclaim publickly something lost or found, in order to its recovery or restitution.

She seeks, she sighs, but no where spies him:
Love is lost, and thus she cries him. Crashaw.

To CRY down, cri-dŏŭn'. v. a.

1. To blame; to depreciate; to decry.

Bavius cries down an admirable treatise of philosophy, and says there 's atheism in it. Watts.

Men of dissolute lives cry down religion, because they would not be under the restraints of it. Tillotson.

2. To prohibit.

By all means cry down that unworthy course of late times, that they should pay money. Bacon.

3. To overbear.

I'll to the king,
And from a mouth of honour quite cry down
This Ipswich fellow's insolence. Shakspeare.

To CRY out, krī-ŏŭt'. v. n.

1. To exclaim; to scream; to clamour.

They make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty. Job.

With that Susanna cried with a loud voice, and the two elders cried out against her. Sus. xxiv.

2. To complain loudly.

We are ready to cry out of an unequal management, and to blame the Divine administration. Atterbury.

3. To blame; to censure: with of, against, upon.

Are these things then necessities?
Then let us meet them like necessities;
And that same word even now cries out on us.
Shakspeare.

Giddy censure
Will then cry out of Marcius: oh, if he
Had borne the business. Shakspeare.

Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard. Job, xix. 7.

Cry out upon the stars for doing
Ill offices, to cross their wooing. Hudibras.

Epiphanius cries out upon it, as rank idolatry, and destructive to their souls who did it. Stillingfleet.

Tumult, sedition, and rebellion, are things that the followers of that hypothesis cry out against. Locke.

I find every sect, as far as reason will help them, make use of it gladly; and where it fails them, they cry out, it is matter of faith, and above reason. Locke.

4. To declare loud.
5. To be in labour.

What! is she crying out?——

——So said her woman; and that her suff'rance made
Each pang a death. Shakspeare's Henry VIII.

To CRY up, krī-ŭp'. v. a.

1. To applaud; to exalt; to praise.

Instead of crying up all things which are brought from beyond sea, let us advance the native commodities of our own kingdom. Bacon.

The philosopher deservedly suspected himself of vanity when cried up by the multitude. Glanville.

The astrologer, if his predictions come to pass, is cried up to the stars from whence he pretends to draw them. South.

They slight the strongest arguments that can be brought for religion, and cry up very weak ones against it. Tillotson.

He may out of interest, as well as conviction, cry up that for sacred, which, if once trampled on and profaned, he himself cannot be safe, nor secure. Locke.

Poets, like monarchs on an eastern throne,
Confin'd by nothing but their will alone,
Here can cry up, and there as boldly blame,
And, as they please, give infamy or fame. Walsh.

Those who are fond of continuing the war, cry up our constant success at a most prodigious rate. Swift.

2. To raise the price by proclamation.

All the effect that I conceive was made by crying up the pieces of eight, was to bring in much more of that species, instead of others current here. Temple.

CRY, krī. n. s. [cri, Fr.]

1. Lamentation; shriek; scream.

And all the first born in the land of Egypt shall die, and there shall be a great cry throughout all the land. Exodus.

2. Weeping; mourning.
3. Clamour; outcry.

Amazement seizes all; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die. Dryden.

These narrow and selfish views have so great an influence in this cry, that there are several of my fellow freeholders who fancy the church in danger upon the rising of bank stock. Addison.

4. Exclamation of triumph or wonder, or any other passion.

In popish countries some impostor cries out, a miracle! a miracle! to confirm the deluded vulgar, in their errours; and so the cry goes round, without examining into the cheat. Swift.

5. Proclamation.
6. The hawkers' proclamation of wares to be sold in the street: as, the cries of London.
7. Acclamation; popular favour.

The cry went once for thee,
And still it might, and yet it may again. Shaksp.

8. Voice; utterance; manner of vocal expression.

Sounds also, besides the distinct cries of birds and beasts, are modified by diversity of notes of different length, put together, which make that complex idea called tune. Locke.

9. Importunate call.

Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them. Jer.

10. Yelping of dogs.

He scorns the dog, resolves to try
The combat next; but if their cry
Invades again his trembling ear,
He straight resumes his wonted care. Waller.

11. Yell; inarticulate noise.

There shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills. Zeph. i. 10.

12. A pack of dogs.

About her middle round,
A cry of hell-hounds never ceasing bark'd. Milton.

You common cry of curs, whose breath I hate
As reek o' th' rotten fens; whose loves I prize

As the dead carcases of unburied men,
That do corrupt my air. Shaksp. Coriolanus.

CRY'AL, krī'âl. n. s. The heron. Ainsworth.

CRY'ER, krī'ûr.[166] See CRIER.

CRY'ER, krī'ûr.[166] n. s. A kind of hawk, called the falcon gentle, an enemy to pigeons, and very swift. Ainsworth.

CRY'PTICAL, krĭp'tĕ-kâl. } adj.
CRY'PTICK, krĭp'tĭk. } [κρύπτω.]
Hidden; secret; occult; private; unknown; not divulged.

The students of nature, conscious of her more cryptick ways of working, resolve many strange effects into the near efficiency of second causes. Glanville's Apol.

Speakers, whose chief business is to amuse or delight, do not confine themselves to any natural order, but in a cryptical or hidden method adapt every thing to their ends. Watts.

CRY'PTICALLY, krĭp'tĕ-kâl-lĕ. adv. [from cryptical.] Occultly; secretly: perhaps, in the following example, the author might have written critically.

We take the word acid in a familiar sense, without cryptically distinguishing it from those sapors that are a-kin to it. Boyle.

CRYPTO'GRAPHY, krĭp-tŏg'grâ-fĕ.[518] n. s. [κρύπτω and γράφω.]
1. The act of writing secret characters.
2. Secret characters; cyphers.

CRYPTO'LOGY, krĭp-tŏl'lŏ-jĕ.[518] n. s. [κρύπτω and λόγος.] Enigmatical language.

CRY'STAL, krĭs'tâl. n. s. [κρύσταλλος.]
1. Crystals are hard, pellucid, and naturally colourless bodies, of regularly angular figures, composed of simple, not filamentous plates, not flexile or elastick, giving fire with steel, not fermenting with acid menstrua, and calcining in a strong fire. There are many various species of it produced in different parts of the globe. Hill on Fossils.

Island crystal is a genuine spar, of an extremely pure, clear, and fine texture, seldom either blemished with flaws or spots, or stained with any other colour. A remarkable property of this body, which has much employed the writers on opticks, is its double refraction; so that if it be laid over a black line, drawn on paper, two lines appear in the place of one. Hill.

Water, as it seems, turneth into crystal; as is seen in divers caves, where the crystal hangs in stillicidiis. Bacon.

If crystal be a stone, it is not immediately concreted by the efficacy of cold, but rather by a mineral spirit. Brown.

Crystal is certainly known and distinguished by the degree of its diaphaneity and of its refraction, as also of its hardness, which are ever the same. Woodward.

2. Crystal is also used for a factitious body cast in the glass-houses, called also crystal glass, which is carried to a degree of perfection beyond the common glass; though it comes far short of the whiteness and vivacity of the natural crystal. Chambers.
3. Crystals [in chymistry] express salts or others matters shot or congealed in manner of crystal. Chambers.

If the menstruum be overcharged, within a short time the metals will shoot into certain crystals. Bacon.

CRY'STAL, krĭs'tâl. adj.
1. Consisting of crystal.

Then, Jupiter, thou king of gods,
Thy crystal window ope, look out. Shakspeare.

2. Bright; clear; transparent; lucid; pellucid.

In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds,
By crystal streams that murmur through the meads. Dryden.

CRY'STALLINE, krĭs'tâl-lĭne, or krĭs'tâl-lĭn.[148 149] adj. [crystallinus, Lat.]
1. Consisting of crystal.

Mount eagle to my palace crystalline. Shaksp.

We provided ourselves with some small receivers, blown of crystalline glass. Boyle.

2. Bright; clear; pellucid; transparent.

The clarifying of water is an experiment tending to the health; besides the pleasure of the eye, when water is crystalline. It is effected by casting in and placing pebbles at the head of the current, that the water may strain through them. Bacon.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime
On the crystalline sky, in saphir thron'd
Illustrious far and wide. Milton.

CRY'STALLINE Humour, krĭs'tâl-lĭn-ŭ'mŭr. n. s. The second humour of the eye, that lies immediately next to the aqueous behind the uvea, opposite to the papilla, nearer to the fore part than the back part of the globe. It is the least of the humours, but much more solid than any of them. Its figure, which is convex on both sides, resembles two unequal segments of spheres, of which the most convex is on its back side, which makes a small cavity in the glassy humour in which it lies. It is covered with a fine coat, called aranea.

The parts of the eye are made convex, and especially the crystalline humour, which is of a lenticular figure, convex on both sides. Ray on the Creation.

CRYSTALLIZA'TION, krĭs-tâl-lĕ-zā'shŭn. n. s. [from crystallize.]
1. Congelation into crystals.

Such a combination of saline particles as resembles the form of a crystal, variously modified, according to the nature and texture of the salts. The method is by dissolving any saline body in water, and filtering it, to evaporate, till a film appear at the top, and then let it stand to shoot; and this it does by that attractive force which is in all bodies, and particularly in salt, by reason of its solidity: whereby, when the menstruum or fluid, in which such particles flow, is sated enough or evaporated, so that the saline particles are within each other's attractive powers, they draw one another more than they are drawn by the fluid, then will they run into crystals. And this is peculiar to those, that, let them be ever so much divided and reduced into minute particles, yet when they are formed into crystals, they each of them resume their proper shapes; so that one might as easily divest them of their saltness, as of their figure. This being an immutable and perpetual law, by knowing the figure of the crystals, we may understand what the texture of the particles ought to be, which can form those crystals; and, on the other hand, by knowing the texture of the particles, may be determined the figure of the crystals. Quincy.

2. The mass formed by congelation or concretion.

All natural metallick and mineral crystallizations were effected by the water, which first brought the particles whereof each consists, out from amongst the matter of the strata. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

To CRY'STALLIZE, krĭs'tâl-lize. v. a. [from crystal.] To cause to congeal or concrete in crystals.

If you dissolve copper in aqua fortis, or spirit of nitre, you may, by crystallizing the solution, obtain a goodly blue. Boyle.

To CRY'STALLIZE, krĭs'tâl-lize.[159] v. n. To coagulate, congeal, concrete, or shoot into crystals.

Recent urine will crystallize by inspissation, and afford a salt neither acid nor alkaline. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CUB, kŭb. n. s. [of uncertain etymology.]
1. The young of a beast; generally of a fox or bear.

I would outstare the sternest eyes that look,
Pluck the young sucking cubs from the she-bear. Shakspeare.

This night wherein the cub-drawn bear would crouch,
The lion, and the belly-pinched wolf,
Keep their fur dry. Shaksp. King Lear.

In the eagle's destroying one fox's cubs, there's power executed with oppression. L'Estrange.

2. The young of a whale, perhaps of any viviparous fish.

Two mighty whales, which swelling seas had tost,
One as a mountain vast, and with her came
A cub, not much inferior to his dame. Waller.

3. In reproach or contempt, a young boy or girl.

O thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be,
When time hath sown a grizzle on thy case?
Or will not else thy craft so quickly grow,
That thine own trip shall be thine overthrow? Shakspeare.

O most comical sight! a country squire, with the equipage of a wife and two daughters, came to Mr. Snipwell's shop last night; but such two unlick'd cubs! Congreve.

To CUB, kŭb. v. a. [from the noun.] To bring forth: used of beasts, or of a woman in contempt.

Cubb'd in a cabin, on a mattrass laid,
On a brown george with lousy swabbers fed:
Dead wine, that stinks of the Borrachio, sup
From a foul jack, or greasy maple cup. Dryden.

CUBA'TION, kū-bā'shŭn. n. s. [cubatio, Lat.] The act of lying down. Dict.

CU'BATORY, kū'bā-tŭr-ĕ.[512] adj. [from cubo, Lat.] Recumbent. Dict.

CU'BATURE, kū'bā-tûre. n. s. [from cube.] The finding exactly the solid content of any proposed body. Harris.

CUBE, kūbe. n. s. [from κῦβος, a die.]
1. [In geometry.] A regular solid body, consisting of six square and equal faces or sides, and the angles all right, and therefore equal. Chambers.
2. [In arithmetick.] See CUBICK Number.

All the master planets move about the sun at several distances, as their common centre, and with different velocities. This common law being observed in all of them, that the squares of the times of the revolutions are proportional to the cubes of their distances. Grew's Cosmologia.

CUBE Root, kūbe'rōōt. } n. s. The CU'BICK Root, kū'bĭk-rōōt. } original of a cubick number; or a number, by whose multiplication into itself, and again into the product, any given number is formed: thus two is the cube root of eight. Chambers.

CU'BEB, kū'bĕb. n. s. A small dried fruit resembling pepper, but somewhat longer, of a grayish brown colour on the surface. It has an aromatick smell, and is acrid to the taste. Cubebs are brought from Java. Hill.

Aromaticks, as cubebs, cinnamon, and nutmegs, are usually put into crude poor wines, to give them more oily spirits. Floyer on the Humours

Cu'bical, kû'bė-kâl. } adj. [from cube.]
Cu'bick, kû'bik.[509] }

1. Having the form or properties of a cube.

A close vessel, containing ten cubical feet of air, will not suffer a wax candle of an ounce to burn in it above an hour before it is suffocated. Wilkins's Math. Mag.

It is above a hundred to one, against a particular throw that you do not cast any given set of faces with four cubical dice; because there are so many several combinations of the six faces of four dice. Bentley's Sermons.

2. It is applied to numbers.

The number of four, multiplied into itself, produceth the square number of sixteen; and that again multiplied by four, produceth the cubick number of sixty-four. If we should suppose a multitude actually infinite, there must be infinite roots, and square and cubick numbers; yet, of necessity the root is but the fourth part of the square, and the sixteenth part of the cubick number. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

The number of ten hath been as highly extolled, as containing even, odd, long and plain, quadrate and cubical numbers. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Cu'bicalness, kû'bė-kâl-nės. n. s. [from cubical.] The state or quality of being cubical.

Cubi'culary, kû-bik'kû-lâr-ė. adj. [cubiculum, Lat.] Fitted for the posture of lying down.

Custom, by degrees, changed their cubiculary beds into discubitory, and introduced a fashion to go from the baths unto these. Brown's Vulg. Err.

Cu'biform, kû'bė-fôrm. adj. [from cube and form.] Of the shape of a cube.

Cu'bit, kû'bit. n. s. [from cubitus, Lat.] A measure in use among the ancients; which was originally the distance from the elbow, bending inwards, to the extremity of the middle finger. This measure is the fourth part of a well proportioned man's stature. Some fix the Hebrew cubit at twenty inches and a half, Paris measure; and others at eighteen. Calmet.

From the tip of the elbow to the end of the long finger, is half a yard, and a quarter of the stature; and makes a cubit, the first measure we read of, the ark of Noah being framed and measured by cubits. Holder on Time.

Measur'd by cubit, length, and breadth, and height. Milton.

The Jews used two sorts of cubits; the sacred, and the profane or common one. Arbuthnot.

When on the goddess first I cast my sight,
Scarce seem'd her stature of a cubit height. Pope.

Cu'bital, kû'bė-tâl. adj. [cubitalis, Lat.] Containing only the length of a cubit.

The watchmen of Tyre might well be called pygmies, the towers of that city being so high, that unto men below they appeared in a cubital stature. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Cu'ckingstool, kûk'ĭng-stôôl.[396] n. s. An engine invented for the punishment of scolds and unquiet women, which, in ancient times, was called tumbrel. Cowell.

These mounted on a chair-curule,
Which moderns call a cucking-stool,
March proudly to the river's side. Hudibras.

Cu'ckold, kûk'kûld.[166] n. s. [cocu, Fr. from coukoo.] One that is married to an adultress; one whose wife is false to his bed

But for all the whole world; why, who would not make her husband a cuckold, to make him a monarch? I should venture purgatory for't. Shaksp.

There have been,
Or I am much deceiv'd, cuckolds ere now;
And many a man there is, ev'n at this present.
Now while I speak this, holds his wife by th' arm,
That little thinks she has been sluic'd in's absence. Shakspeare.

For though the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed. Dryden.

Ever since the reign of King Charles II. the alderman is made a cuckold, the deluded virgin is debauched, and adultery and fornication are committed behind the scenes. Swift.

To Cu'ckold, kûk'kûld. v. a.

1. To corrupt a man's wife; to bring upon a man the reproach of having an adulterous wife; to rob a man of his wife's fidelity.

If thou cans't cuckold him, thou dost't thyself a pleasure, and me a sport. Shaksp. Othello.

2. To wrong a husband by unchastity.

But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam,
Nor strut in streets with amazonian pace;
For that's to cuckold thee before thy face. Dryden.

Cu'ckoldly, kûk'kûld-lė. adj. [from cuckold.] Having the qualities of a cuckold; poor; mean; cowardly; sneaking.

Poor cuckoldly knave, I know him not: yet I wrong him to call him poor; they say the jealous knave hath masses of money. Shakspeare.

Cu'ckoldmaker, kûk'kûld-mâ-kûr. n. s. [cuckold and maker.] One that makes a practice of corrupting wives.

If I spared any that had a head to hit, either young or old, he or she, cuckold, or cuckoldmaker, let me never hope to see a chine again. Shaksp.

One Hernando, cuckoldmaker to this city contrived to steal her away. Dryden's Spanish Friar.

Cu'ckoldom, kûk'kûl-dûm. n. s. [from cuckold.]

1. The act of adultery.

She is thinking of nothing but her colonel, and conspiring cuckoldom against me. Dryden.

2. The state of a cuckold.

It is a true saying, that the last man of the parish that knows of his cuckoldom, is himself. Arburthnot's John Bull.

Cu'ckoo, kûk'kôô.[174] n. s. [cuculus, Lat. cwccw, Welsh; cocu, French; cokkock, Dutch.]

1. A bird which appears in the spring, and is said to suck the eggs of other birds, and lay her own to be hatched in their place: from which practice, it was usual to alarm a husband, at the approach of an adulterer, by calling cuckoo; which, by mistake, was in time applied to the husband. This bird is remarkable for the uniformity of his note, from which his name in most tongues seems to have been formed.

Finding Mopsa, like a cuckoo by a nightingale, alone with Pamela, I came in. Sidney.

The merry cuckoo, messenger of spring,
His trumpet shrill hath thrice already sounded. Spenser.

The plain song cuckoo gray,
Whose note full many a man doth mark,
And dares not answer, nay. Shaksp.

Take heed, have open eye; for thieves do foot by night:
Take heed ere summer comes, or cuckoo birds affright. Shakspeare.

I deduce,
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of spring; and touch a theme
Unknown to fame; the passion of the grove. Thomson.

2. It is a name of contempt.

Why, what a rascal art thou, then, to praise him so for running!——A-horseback, ye cuckoo;—but a-foot, he will not budge a foot. Shak. Henry IV.

Cu'ckoo-bud, kûk'kôô-bûd. } n. s.
Cu'ckoo-flower, kûk'kôô-flôû-ûr. }
[cardaminus, Lat.] The name of a flower.

When dazies pied, and violets blue,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows much bedight. Shakspeare

Nettles, cuckoo-flowers,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds. Shaksp. King Lear

Cu'ckoo-spittle, kûk'kôô-spit-tl. n. s. [cuckoo and spittle.]

Cuckoo-spittle, or woodseare, is that spumous dew or exudation, or both, found upon plants, especially about the joints of lavender and rosemary; observable with us about the latter end of May. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Cu'cullate, kû-kûl'lâte.[91] } adj. [cu-
Cu'cullated, kû-kûl'lâ-tėd. } culatus, hooded, Lat.]

1. Hooded; covered, as with a hood or cowl.

2. Having the resemblance or shape of a hood.

They are differently cucullated, and capuched, upon the head and back. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Cu'cumber, kôû'kûm-bûr.[169] n. s. [cucumis, Lat.] The name of a plant, and also of the fruit of that plant.

It hath a flower consisting of one single leaf, bell-shaped, and expanded toward the top, and cut into many segments; of which some are male, or barren, having no embryo, but only a large style in the middle, charged with the farina: others are female, or fruitful, being fastened to an embryo, which is afterwards changed into a fleshy fruit, for the most part oblong and turbinated, which is divided into three or four cells, inclosing many oblong seeds. The species are, 1. The common cucumber. 2. The white cucumber. 3. The long Turkey cucumber. Miller.

How cucumbers along the surface creep,
With crooked bodies and with bellies deep. Dryden's Virgil.

Cucurbita'ceous, kû-kûr-bė-tâ'-shûs. adj. [from cucurbita, Lat. a gourd.]

Cucurbitaceous plants are those which resemble a gourd; such as the pumpion and melon. Chamb.

Cu'curbite, kû'kûr-bit.[156] n. s. [cucurbita, Lat.] A chymical vessel, commonly called a body, made of earth or glass, in the shape of a gourd, and therefore called cucurbite. Quincy.

I have, for curiosity's sake, distilled quicksilver in a cucurbite, fitted with a capacious glass head. Boyle on Colours.

Let common yellow sulphur be put into a cucurbite glass, upon which pour the strongest aqua fortis. Mortimer.

Cud, kûd. n. s. [cuð, Sax.] That food which is reposited in the first stomach in order to rumination, or to be chewed again.

Many times, when my master's cattle came hither to chew their cud in this fresh place, I might see the young bull testify his love. Sidney.

You range the pathless wood,
While on a flow'ry bank he chews the cud. Dryd.

Cu'dden, kûd'dn. } n. s. [without ety-
Cu'ddy, kûd'dė.[103] } mology.] A clown; a stupid rustick; a low dolt; a low bad word.

The slavering cudden, propp'd upon his staff,
Stood ready gaping with a grinning laugh. Dryden.

To Cu'DDLE, kŭd'dl.[405] v. n. [a low word, I believe, without etymology.] To lie close; to squat.

Have you mark'd a partridge quake,
Viewing the tow'ring falcon nigh?
She cuddles low behind the brake;
Nor would she stay, nor dares she fly. Prior.

CU'DGEL, kŭd'jil. n. s. [kudse, Dut.]

1. A stick to strike with, lighter than a club, shorter than a pole.

Vine twigs, while they are green, are brittle; yet the wood, dried, is extreme tough; and was used by the captains of armies, amongst the Romans, for their cudgels. Bacon.

Do not provoke the rage of stones
And cudgels to thy hide and bones;
Tremble and vanish. Hudibras.

The ass was quickly given to understand, with a good cudgel, the difference betwixt the one play-fellow and the other. L'Estrange.

His surly officer ne'er fail'd to crack
His knotty cudgel on his tougher back. Dryden.

This, if well reflected on, would make people more wary in the use of the rod and the cudgel. Locke.

The wise Cornelius was convinced, that these, being polemical arts, could no more be learned alone than fencing or cudgel-playing. Arbuthnot and Pope.

2. To cross the Cudgels is to forbear the contest, from the practice of cudgel-players to lay one over the other.

It is much better to give way, than it would be to contend at first, and then either to cross the cudgels, or to be baffled in the conclusion. L'Estrange.

To Cu'DGEL, kŭd'jil. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To beat with a stick.

My lord, he speaks most vilely of you, like a foul-mouthed man as he is; and said he would cudgel you. Shakspeare's Henry IV.

The ass courting his master, just as the spaniel had done, instead of being stroked and made much of, is only rated off and cudgelled for all his courtship. South.

Three duels he fought, thrice ventur'd his life;
Went home, and was cudgell'd again by his wife. Swift.

2. To beat in general.

Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating. Shaksp. Hamlet.

A good woman happened to pass by, as a company of young fellows were cudgelling a walnut-tree, and asked them what they did that for. L'Estrange.

CUDGEL-PROOF, kŭd'jil-prōōf. adj. Able to resist a stick.

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel-proof. Hudibras.

Cu'DLE, kŭd'dl. n. s. A small sea-fish.

Of round fish there are britt, sprat, cudles, eels. Carew.

Cu'DWEED, kŭd'wēde. n. s. [from cud and weed.] A plant. Miller.

CUE, kū. n. s. [queue a tail, Fr.]

1. The tail or end of any thing; as, the long curl of a wig.

2. The last words of a speech, which the player, who is to answer, catches, and regards as intimation to begin.

Pyramus, you begin: when you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake; and so every one according to his cue. Shaksp.

3. A hint; an intimation; a short direction.

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do,
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears. Shaksp.

Let him know how many servants there are, of both sexes, who expect vails; and give them their cue to attend in two lines, as he leaves the house. Swift.

4. The part which any man is to play in his turn.

Hold your hands,
Both you of my inclining, and the rest:
Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it
Without a prompter. Shaksp. Othello.

Neither is Otto here a much more taking gentleman: nothing appears in his cue to move pity, or any way make the audience of his party. Rymer's Tragedies of the last Age.

5. Humour; temper of mind: a low word.

CU'ERPO, kwĕr'pō. n. s. [Span.] To be in cuerpo, is to be without the upper coat or cloke, so as to discover the true shape of the cuerpo or body.

Exposed in cuerpo to their rage,
Without my arms and equipage. Hudibras.

CUFF, kŭf. n. s. [zuffa, a battle; zuffare, to fight, Ital.]

1. A blow with the fist; a box; a stroke.

The priest let fall the book,
And as he stoop'd again to take it up,
The mad brain'd bridegroom took him such a cuff,
That down fell priest and book, and book and priest. Shaksp.

There was no money bid for argument, unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question. Shaksp.

He gave her a cuff on the ear, and she would prick him with her knitting-needle. Arbuthnot's John Bull.

Their own sects, which now lie dormant, would be soon at cuffs again with each other about power and preferment. Swift.

2. It is used of birds that fight with their talons.

To Cuff, kŭf. v. n. [from the noun.] To fight; to scuffle.

Clapping farces acted by the court,
While the peers cuff to make the rabble sport. Dryden's Juvenal.

To Cuff, kŭf. v. a.

1. To strike with the fist.

I'll after him again, and beat him.——
——Do, cuff him soundly; but never draw thy sword. Shaksp.

Where not you, my friend, abused, and cuffed, and kicked? Congreve's Old Bachelor.

2. To strike with the talons.

Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious. Otway.

The dastard crow, that to the wood made wing,
With her loud kaws her craven kind does bring,
Who, safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird. Dryden.

They with their quills did all the hurt they cou'd,
And cuff'd the tender chickens from their food. Dryden.

3. To strike with the wings. This seems improper.

Hov'ring about the coasts, they make their moan,
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own. Dryden's Æneid.

CUFF, kŭf. n. s. [coeffe, Fr.] Part of the sleeve.

He railed at fops; and, instead of the common fashion, he would visit his mistress in a morning gown, band, short cuffs, and a peaked beard. Arbuthnot.

CUI'NAGE, kwī'nĭdje.[90 165] n. s. The making up of twine into such forms, as it is commonly framed into for carriage to other places. Cowell.

CUI'RASS, kwē-rās.[340] n. s. [cuirasse, Fr. from cuir, leather; coraccia, Ital.] A breastplate.

The lance pursued the voice without delay,
And pierc'd his cuirass, with such fury sent,
And sign'd his bosom with a purple dint. Dryden.

Cuira'ssier, kwē-rās-sēēr'.[275] n. s. [from cuirass.] A man at arms; a soldier in armour.

The field, all iron, cast a gleaming brown,
Nor wanted clouds of foot, nor on each horn
Cuirassiers, all in steel, for standing fight. Milton.

The picture of St. George, wherein he is described like a cuirassier, or horseman completely armed, is rather a symbolical image than any proper figure. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Cuish, kwĭs.[340] n. s. [cuisse, Fr.] The armour that covers the thighs.

I saw young Harry, with his beaver on,
His cuishes on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury. Shaksp. Henry IV.

The croslet some, and some the cuishes mould,
With silver plated, and with ductile gold. Dryden.

But what had our author to wound Æneas with at so critical a time? And how came the cuishes to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour? Dryden.

Cu'LDEES, kŭl'dēze. n. s. [colidei, Lat.] Monks in Scotland.

Cu'LERAGE, kŭl'ŭr-āje. n. s. The same plant with Arse-smart. Ainsworth.

Cu'LINARY, kū'lē-nār-ē.[512] adj. [culina, Lat.] Relating to the kitchen; relating to the art of cookery.

Great weight may condense those vapours and exhalations, as soon as they shall at any time begin to ascend from the sun, and make them presently fall back again into him, and by that action increase his heat; much after the manner that, in our earth, the air increases the heat of a culinary fire. Newton.

To those who, by reason of their northern exposition, will be still forced to be at the expense of culinary fires, it will reduce the price of their manufacture. Arbuthnot.

To CULL, kŭl. v. a. [cuellir, Fr.] To select from others; to pick out of many.

The best of every thing they had been culled out for themselves, if there was in their flocks any poor diseased thing not worth the keeping, they thought it good enough for the altar of God. Hooker.

Our engines shall be bent
Against the brows of this resisting town:
Call for our chiefest men of discipline,
To cull the plots of best advantage. Shaksp.

Like the bee, culling from ev'ry flow'r,
Our thighs are packt with wax, our mouths with honey. Shaksp.

I do remember an apothecary
In tatter'd weeds, with overwhelming brows,
Culling of simples. Shaksp. Romeo and Juliet.

Then in a moment fortune shall cull forth,
Out of one side, her happy minion. Shaksp.

The choicest of the British, the Roman, Saxon, and Norman laws, being culled, as it were, this grand charter was extracted. Howel.

When false flow'rs of rhetorick thou would'st cull,
Trust nature, do not labour to be dull. Dryden.

From his herd he culls,
For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls. Dryden's Virgil.

When the current pieces of the same denomination are of different weights, then the traders in money cull out the heavier, and melt them down with profit. Locke.

With humble duty, and officious haste,
I'll cull the farthest mead for thy repast. Prior.

The various off'rings of the world appear:
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,
And decks the goddess with the glitt'ring spoil. Pope

Cu'ller, kůl'lůr.[98] n. s. [from cull.] One who picks or chooses.

CU'LLION, kůl'yůn.[113] n. s. [coglione, a fool, Ital. or perhaps from scullion. It seems to import meanness rather than folly.] A scoundrel; a mean wretch.

Such a one as leaves a gentleman,
And makes a god of such a cullion. Shaksp.
Up to the breach, you dogs; avaunt, you cullions. Shaksp.

Cu'llionly, kůl'yůn-lė. adj. [from cullion.] Having the qualities of a cullion; mean; base.

I'll make a sop o' th' moonshine of you: you whoreson, cullionly, barber-monger, draw. Shaksp. King Lear.

Cu'llumbine, kůl'lům-bine. n. s. [more properly spelt Columbine.] The flowers of this plant are beautifully variegated with blue, purple, red, and white. Miller.

Her goodly bosom, like a strawberry bed;
Her neck like to a bunch of cullumbines. Spenser.

CU'LLY, kůl'lė. n. s. [coglione, Ital. a fool.] A man deceived or imposed upon; as by sharpers, or a strumpet.

Why should you, whose mother-wits
Are furnished with all perquisites,
B' allow'd to put all tricks upon
Our cully sex, and we use none? Hudibras.
Yet the rich cullies may their boasting spare:
They purchase but sophisticated ware. Dryden.
He takes it in mighty dudgeon, because I won't let him make me over by deed as his lawful cully. Arbuthnot.

To Cu'lly, kůl'lė. v. a. [from the noun.] To befool; to cheat; to trick; to deceive; to impose upon.

Culmi'ferous, kůl-mif'fė-růs. adj. [culmus and fero, Lat.]

Culmiferous plants are such as have a smooth jointed stalk, and usually hollow; and at each joint the stalk is wrapped about with single, narrow, long, sharp-pointed leaves, and their seeds are contained in chaffy husks. Quincy.

There are also several sorts of grasses, both of the Cyprus and culmiferous kinds; some with broader, others with narrower leaves. Woodward on Fossils.

The properest food of the vegetable kingdom is taken from the farinaceous or mealy seeds of some culmiferous plants; as oats, barley, wheat, rice, rye, maize, panic, millet. Arbuthnot.

To CU'LMINATE, kůl-mė-nate. v. n. [culmen, Lat.] To be vertical; to be in the meridian.

Far and wide his eye commands;
For sight no obstacle found here, or shade,
But all sunshine; as when his beams at noon
Culminate from th' equator. Milton's Par. Lost.

Culmina'tion, kůl-mė-nā'shůn. n. s. [from culminate.] The transit of a planet through the meridian.

Culpabi'lity, kůl-pā-bil'ė-tė. n. s. [from culpable.] Blameableness.

CU'LPABLE, kůl'pā-bl.[405] adj. [culpabilis, Lat.]

1. Criminal.

Proceed no straiter 'gainst our uncle Glo'ster,
Than from true evidence of good esteem
He be approved in practice culpable. Shaksp.

2. Guilty: with of.

These being perhaps culpable of this crime, or favourers of their friends. Spenser.

3. Blameable; blameworthy.

The wisdom of God setteth before us in Scripture so many admirable patterns of virtue, and no one of them without somewhat noted wherein they were culpable; to the end that to Him alone it might always be acknowledged, Thou only art holy, Thou only art just. Hooker.

All such ignorance is voluntary, and therefore culpable; forasmuch as it was in every man's power to have prevented it. South.

Cu'lpableness, kůl'pā-bl-nės. n. s. [from culpable.] Blame; guilt.

Cu'lpably, kůl'pā-blė. adv. [from culpable.] Blameably; criminally.

If we perform this duty pitifully and culpably, it is not to be expected we should communicate holily. Taylor.

Cu'lprit, kůl'prit. n. s. [about this word there is great dispute. It is used by the judge at criminal trials, who, when the prisoner declares himself not guilty, and puts himself upon his trial, answers Culprit, God send thee a good deliverance. It is likely that it is a corruption of Qu'il paroit, May it so appear; the wish of the judge being that the prisoner may be found innocent.] A man arraigned before his judge.

The knight appear'd, and silence they proclaim;
Then first the culprit answer'd to his name;
And, after forms of law, was last requir'd
To name the thing that woman most desir'd. Dryd.

An author is in the condition of a culprit; the publick are his judges: by allowing too much, and condescending too far, he may injure his own cause; and, by pleading and asserting too boldly, he may displease the court. Prior.

Cu'lter, kůl'tůr. n. s. [culter, Lat.] The iron of the plough perpendicular to the share. It is commonly written coulter.

Her fallow lees
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory,
Doth root upon; while that the culter rusts
That should deracinate such savagery. Shaksp.

To CU'LTIVATE, kůl'tė-vāte. v. a. [cultiver, Fr.]

1. To forward or improve the product of the earth by manual industry.

Those excellent seeds implanted in your birth, will, if cultivated, be most flourishing in production; and, as the soil is good, and no cost nor care wanting to improve it, we must entertain hopes of the richest harvest. Felton on the Classicks.

2. To improve; to meliorate.

Were we but less indulgent to our faults,
And patience had to cultivate our thoughts,
Our muse would flourish. Waller.
To make man mild and sociable to man,
To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and liberal arts,
Th' embellishments of life. Addison's Cato.

Cultiva'tion, kůl-tė-vā'shůn. n. s. [from cultivate.]

1. The art or practice of improving soils, and forwarding or meliorating vegetables.

2. Improvement in general; promotion; melioration.

An innate light discovers the common notions of good and evil, which, by cultivation and improvement, may be advanced to higher and brighter discoveries. South.

A foundation of good sense, and a cultivation of learning, are required to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing. Dryden.

Cultiva'tor, kůl'tė-vā-tůr.[512] n. s. [from cultivate.] One who improves, promotes, or meliorates; or endeavours to forward any vegetable product, or any thing else capable of improvement.

It has been lately complained of, by some cultivators of clover grass, that from a great quantity of the seed not any grass springs up. Boyle.

CU'LTURE, kůl'tshůre.[461] n. s. [cultura, Lat.]

1. The act of cultivation; the act of tilling the ground; tillage.

Give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may come fruit of it. 2 Esdras, viii. 6.

These three last were slower than the ordinary wheat of itself, and this culture did rather retard than advance. Bacon.

The plough was not invented till after the deluge; the earth requiring little or no care or culture, but yielding its increase freely, and without labour and toil. Woodward.

Where grows?—Where grows it not? If vain our toil,
We ought to blame the culture, not the soil.
Fix'd to no spot is happiness sincere. Pope.
They rose as vigorous as the sun;
Then to the culture of the willing glebe. Thomson.

2. Art of improvement and melioration.

One might wear any passion out of a family by culture, as skilful gardeners blot a colour out of a tulip that hurts its beauty. Tatler.

To Cu'lture, kůl'tshůre. v. a. [from the noun.] To cultivate; to manure; to till. It is used by Thomson, but without authority.

Cu'lver, kůl'vůr.[98] n. s. [columba, Lat. culfne, Sax.] A pigeon. An old word.

Had he so done, he had him snatch'd away,
More light than culver in the falcon's fist. Spenser.
Whence, borne on liquid wing,
The sounding culver shoots. Thomson's Spring.

Cu'lverin, kůl'vė-rin. n. s. [colouvrine, Fr.] A species of ordnance; originally a hawk.

A whole cannon requires, for every charge forty pounds of powder, and a bullet of sixty-four pounds; a culverin, sixteen pounds of powder, and a bullet of nineteen pounds; a demi-culverin, nine pounds of powder, and a bullet of twelve pounds. Wilkins.

Here a well polish'd mall gives us the joy
To see our prince his matchless force employ:
No sooner has he touch'd the flying ball,
But 'tis already more than half the mall;
And such a fury from his arm 't has got,
As from a smoking culverin 'twere shot. Waller.

Cu'lverkey, kůl'vėr-kė. n. s. A flower.

Looking down the meadows I could see a girl cropping culverkeys and cowslips, to make garlands. Walton's Angler.

To CU'MBER, kům'bůr.[98] v. a. [kommeren, komberen, to disturb, Dut.]

1. To embarrass; to entangle; to obstruct.

Why asks he what avails him not in fight,
And would but cumber and retard his flight,
In which his only excellence is plac'd?
You give him death, that intercept his haste. Dryden's Fables.
Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears,

The learning and mastery of a tongue, being uneasy and unpleasant enough in itself, should not be cumbered with any other difficulties, as is done in this way of proceeding. Locke.

2. To crowd or load with something useless.

Let it not cumber your better remembrance. Shaksp. Timon.

The multiplying variety of arguments, especially frivolous ones, is not only lost labour, but cumbers the memory to no purpose. Locke.

3. To involve in difficulties and dangers; to distress.

Domestick fury, and fierce civil strife,
Shall cumber all the parts of Italy. Shaksp.

4. To busy; to distract with multiplicity of cares.

The cups of their deserving. Shaksp.
Will't please your lordship, drink a cup of sack. Shaksp.
They that never had the use
Of the grape's surprising juice,
To the first delicious cup
All their reason render up. Waller.

The best, the dearest fav'rite of the sky
Must taste that cup; for man is born to die. Pope.

3. [In the plural.] Social entertainment; merry bout.

Then shall our names,
Familiar in their mouth as household words,
Be in their flowing cups freshly remember'd.
Shaksp. Henry V.

Let us suppose that I were reasoning, as one friend with another, by the fireside, or in our cups, without care, without any great affection to either party. Knolles.

It was near a miracle to see an old man silent, since talking is the disease of age; but, amongst cups, makes fully a wonder. Ben Jonson's Discov.

Thence from cups to civil broils! Milton.

Amidst his cups with fainting shiv'ring seiz'd,
His limbs disjointed, and all o'er diseas'd,
His hand refuses to sustain the bowl. Dryd.

4. Any thing hollow like a cup: as, the husk of an acorn; the bell of a flower.

A pyrites of the same colour and shape placed in the cavity of another of an hemispherick figure, in much the same manner as an acorn in its cup.
Woodward on Fossils.

5. Cup and Can. Familiar companions. The can is the large vessel out of which the cup is filled, and to which it is a constant associate.

You boasting tell us where you din'd,
And how his lordship was so kind;
Swear he's a most facetious man;
That you and he are cup and can:
You travel with a heavy load,
And quite mistake preferment's road. Swift.

6. [couper, Fr. to scarify.] A glass to draw the blood in scarification.

Hippocrates tells you, that in applying of cups, the scarification ought to be made with crooked instruments. Arbuthnot.

To CUP, kŭp. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To supply with cups. This sense is obsolete.

Plumpy Bacchus, with pink eyne,
In thy vats our cares be drown'd;
With thy grapes our hairs be crown'd!
Cup us, till the world go round. Shaksp.

2. [couper, to cut, Fr.] To fix a glass bell or cucurbite upon the skin, to draw the blood in scarification.

The clotted blood lies heavy on his heart,
Corrupts, and there remains in spite of art:
Nor breathing veins nor cupping will prevail;
All outward remedies and inward fail. Dryden.

You have quartered all the foul language upon me, that could be raked out of the air of Billingsgate, without knowing who I am, or whether I deserve to be cupped and scarified at this rate. Spectator.

Blistering, cupping, and bleeding, are seldom of use but to the idle and intemperate.
Addison's Spectator.

Him the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd;
They bled, they cupp'd, they purg'd; in short they cur'd. Pope.

CUPBE'ARER, kŭp'bâ-rûr. n. s.

1. An officer of the king's household.

There is conveyed to Mr. Villiers an intimation of the king's pleasure to wait and to be sworn his servant, and shortly after his cupbearer at large; and the summer following he was admitted in ordinary.
Wotton.

3. Accuracy; exactness.

Qualities are so weighed, that curiosity in neither can make choice of either's moiety. Shakspeare

Our senses, however armed or assisted, are too gross to discern the curiosity of the workmanship of nature. Ray.

4. An act of curiosity; nice experiment.

There hath been practised also a curiosity, to set a tree upon the north side of a wall, and at a little height, to draw it through the wall, and spread it upon the south side; conceiving that the root and lower part of the stock should enjoy the freshness of the shade, and the upper boughs and fruit, the comfort of the sun; but it sorted not. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

5. An object of curiosity; rarity.

We took a ramble together to see the curiosities of this great town. Addison's Freeholder.

CU'RIOUS, kû'rė-ûs.[314] adj. [curiosus, Lat.]

1. Inquisitive; desirous of information; addicted to inquiry.

Be not curious in unnecessary matters; for more things are shewn unto thee than men understand.
Ecclus. iii. 23.

Even then to them the spirit of lies suggests
That they were blind, because they saw not ill;
And breath'd into their uncorrupted breasts
A curious wish, which did corrupt their will. Davies.

If any one too curious should enquire
After a victory which we disdain,
Then let him know the Belgians did retire
Before the patron saint of injur'd Spain. Dryden.

Reader, if any curious stay
To ask my hated name,
Tell them, the grave that hides my clay
Conceals me from my shame. Wesley.

2. Attentive to; diligent about; sometimes with after.

It is pity a gentleman so very curious after things that were elegant and beautiful, should not have been as curious as to their origin, their uses, and their natural history. Woodward.

3. Sometimes with of.

Then thus a senior of the place replies;
Well read, and curious of antiquities. Dryden.

4. Accurate; careful not to mistake.

Till Arianism had made it a matter of great sharpness and subtlety of wit to be a sound believing Christian, men were not curious what syllables or particles of speech they used. Hooker.

5. Difficult to please; solicitous of perfection; not negligent; full of care.

A temperate person is not curious of fancies and deliciousness; he thinks not much, and speaks not often, of meat and drink. Taylor.

6. Exact; nice; subtle.

Both these senses embrace their objects at greater distance, with more variety, and with a more curious discrimination, than the other sense. Holder.

7. Artful; not neglectful; not fortuitous.

A vaile obscur'd the sunshine of her eyes,
The rose within herself her sweetness clos'd;
Each ornament about her seemly lies,
By curious chance, or careless art, compos'd.
Fairfax.

8. Elegant; neat; laboured; finished.

Understanding to devise curious works, to work in gold. Exodus.

9. Rigid; severe; rigorous.

For curious I cannot be with you,
Signior Baptista, of whom I hear so well. Shaksp.

CU'RIOUSLY, kû'rė-ûs-lė. adv. [from curious.]

1. Inquisitively; attentively; studiously.

He looked very curiously upon himself, sometimes fetching a little skip, as if he said his strength had not yet forsaken him. Sidney.

At first I thought there had been no light reflected from the water in that place; but observing it more curiously, I saw within it several smaller round spots, which appeared much blacker and darker than the rest. Newton's Opticks.

2. Elegantly; neatly.

Nor is it the having of wheels and springs, tho' never so curiously wrought, and artificially set, but the winding of them up, that must give motion to the watch. South.

3. Artfully; exactly.

4. Captiously.

CURL, kûrl. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A ringlet of hair.

She apparelled herself like a page, cutting off her hair, leaving nothing but the short curls to cover that noble head. Sidney.

Just as in act he stood, in clouds enshrin'd,
Her hand she fasten'd on his hair behind,
Then backward by his yellow curls she drew;
To him, and him alone, confess'd in view. Dryden.

2. Undulation; wave; sinuosity; flexure.

Thus it happens, if the glass of the prisms be free from veins, and their sides be accurately plain and well polished, without those numberless waves or curls, which usually arise from the sand holes. Newton's Opticks.

To CURL, kûrl. v. a. [krollen, Dutch; cyppan, Sax. krille, Dan.]

1. To turn the hair in ringlets.

What hast thou been?—
—A serving man, proud in heart and mind, that curled my hair, wore gloves in my cap, served the lusts of my mistress's heart, and did the act of darkness with her. Shaksp. King Lear.

2. To writhe; to twist.

3. To dress with curls.

If she first meet the curled Antony,
He'll make demand of her a kiss. Shakspeare.

They, up the trees
Climbing, sat thicker than the snaky locks
That curl'd Megæra. Milton's Par. Lost.

4. To raise in waves, undulations, or sinuosities.

The visitation of the winds,
Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
Curling their monstrous heads. Shaksp. Henry IV.

Seas would be pools, without the brushing air
To curl the waves. Dryden's Fables.

To CURL, kûrl. v. n.

1. To shrink into ringlets.

Those slender aerial bodies are separated and stretched out, which otherwise, by reason of their flexibleness and weight, would flag or curl. Boyle.

2. To rise in undulations.

To every nobler portion of the town
The curling billows rowl their restless tide;
In parties now they straggle up and down,
As armies, unoppos'd, for prey divide. Dryden.

While curling smoaks from village tops are seen. Pope.

3. To twist itself.

Then round her slender waist he curl'd,
And stamp'd an image of himself, a sov'reign of the world. Dryden's Fables.

CU'RLEW, kûr'lû. n. s. [courlieu, Fr. arquata, Lat.]

1. A kind of water-fowl, with a large beak, of a gray colour, with red and black spots.

Among birds we reckon creysers, curlews, and puffins. Carew.

2. A bird larger than a partridge, with longer legs. It runs very swiftly, and frequents the corn-fields in Spain, in Sicily, and sometimes in France. Trevoux.

CURMU'DGEON, kûr-mûd'jûn.[259] n. s. [It is a vitious manner of pronouncing cœur mechant, Fr. an unknown correspondent.] An avaricious churlish fellow; a miser; a niggard; a churl; a griper.

And when he has it in his claws,
He'll not be hide-bound to the cause;
Nor shalt thou find him a curmudgeon,
If thou dispatch it without grudging. Hudibras.

A man's way of living is commended, because he will give any rate for it; and a man will give any rate rather than pass for a poor wretch, or a penurious curmudgeon. Locke.

CURMU'DGEONLY, kûr-mûd'jûn-lè.[259] adj. [from curmudgeon.] Avaricious; covetous; churlish; niggardly.

In a country where he that killed a hog invited the neighbourhood, a curmudgeonly fellow advised with his companions how he might save the charge. L'Estrange.

CU'RRANT, kûr'rânt. n. s. [ribes, Lat.]

1. The tree hath no prickles; the leaves are large: the flower consists of five leaves, placed in form of a rose: the ovary, which arises from the centre of the flowercup, becomes a globular fruit, produced in bunches.

2. A small dried grape: properly written corinth.

They butter'd currants on fat veal bestow'd,
And rumps of beef with virgin honey stew'd;
Insipid taste, old friend, to them who Paris know,
Where rocombole, shallot, and the rank garlick grow. King.

CU'RRENCY, kûr'rên-sè. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation; power of passing from hand to hand.

The currency of those half-pence would, in the universal opinion of our people, be utterly destructive to this kingdom. Swift.

2. General reception: as, the report had a long currency.

3. Fluency; readiness of utterance; easiness of pronunciation.

4. Continuance; constant flow; uninterrupted course.

The currency of time to establish a custom, ought to be with a continuando from the beginning to the end of the term prescribed. Ayliffe's Parergon.

5. General esteem; the rate at which any thing is vulgarly valued.

He that thinketh Spain to be some great overmatch for this estate, assisted as it is, and may be, is no good mintman, but takes greatness of kingdoms according to their bulk and currency, and not after intrinsick value. Bacon.

6. The papers stamped in the English colonies by authority, and passing for money.

CU'RRENT, kûr'rênt. adj. [currens, Latin.]

1. Circulatory; passing from hand to hand.

Shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. Gen.

That there was current money in Abraham's time, is past doubt, though it is not sure that it was stampt; for he is said to be rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. Arbuthnot.

2. Generally received; uncontradicted; authoritative.

Many strange bruits are received for current. Sidney.

Because such as openly reprove supposed disorders of state are taken for principal friends to the common benefit of all, under this fair and plausible colour, whatsoever they utter passeth for good and current. Hooker.

I have collected the facts, with all possible impartiality, from the current histories of those times. Swift.

3. Common; general.

They have been trained up from their infancy in one set of notions, without ever hearing or knowing what other opinions are current among mankind. Watts.

About three months ago we had a current report of the king of France's death. Addison.

4. Popular; such as is established by vulgar estimation.

We are also to consider the difference between worth and merit, strictly taken: that is a man's intrinsick, this his current, value; which is less or more, as men have occasion for him. Grew.

5. Fashionable; popular.

Oft leaving what is natural and fit,
The current folly proves our ready wit;
And authors think their reputation safe,
Which lives as long as fools are pleas'd to laugh. Pope.

6. Passable; such as may be allowed or admitted.

Fouler than heart can think thee, thou canst make
No excuse current, but to hang thyself. Shakspeare.

7. What is now passing; what is at present in its course: as, the current year.

CU'RRENT, kûr'rênt. n. s.

1. A running stream.

The current, that with gentle murmur glides,
Thou know'st, being stopp'd, impatiently doth rage;
But his fair course is not hindered;
He makes sweet musick with th' enamell'd stones. Shakspeare.

These inequalities will vanish in one place, and presently appear in another, and seem perfectly to move like waves, succeeding and destroying one another; save that their motion oftentimes seems to be quickest, as if in that vast sea they were carried on by a current, or at least by a tide. Boyle.

Heav'n her Eridanus no more shall boast,
Whose fame in thine, like lesser current, 's lost;
Thy nobler streams shall visit Jove's abodes,
To shine among the stars, and bathe the gods. Denham.

Not fabled Po more swells the poet's lays,
While through the sky his shining current strays. Pope.

2. [In navigation.] Currents are certain progressive motions of the water of the sea in several places, either quite down to the bottom, or to a certain determinate depth; by which a ship may happen to be carried more swiftly, or retarded in her course, according to the direction of the current, with or against the way of the ship. Harris.

3. Course; progression.

The castle of Cadmus was taken, and Thebes invested by Phebidas the Lacedemonian insidiously; which drew on a resurprize of the castle, a recovery of the town, and a current of the war, even into the walls of Sparta. Bacon.

CU'RRENTLY, kûr'rênt-lè. adv. [from current]

1. In a constant motion.

2. Without opposition.

The very cause which maketh the simple and ignorant to think they even see how the word of God runneth currently on your side, is, that their minds are forestalled, and their conceits perverted beforehand. Hooker, Preface.

3. Popularly; fashionably; generally.

4. Without ceasing.

Cu'rrentness, kûr'rênt-nês. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation.
2. General reception.
3. Easiness of pronunciation.

When substantialness combineth with delightfulness, and currentness with stayedness, how can the language sound other than most full of sweetness? Camden's Remains.

Cu'rrier, kûr'rê-ûr. n. s. [coriarius, Lat.] One who dresses and pares leather for those who make shoes, or other things.

A currier bought a bear-skin of a huntsman, and laid him down ready money for it. L'Estrange.

Warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found
To lodge their loathsome carrion under ground;
For useless to the currier were their hides,
Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides
Be freed from filth. Dryden.

Cu'rrish, kûr'rîsh. adj. [from cur.] Having the qualities of a degenerate dog; brutal; sour; quarrelsome; malignant; churlish; uncivil; untractable; impracticable.

Sweet speaking oft a currish heart reclaims. Sidney.

No care of justice, nor no rule of reason,
Did thenceforth ever enter in his mind,
But cruelty, the sign of currish kind. Hubb. Tale.
In fashions wayward, and in love unkind;
For Cupid deigns not wound a currish mind.
Fairfax.

I would she were in heaven, so she could
Entreat some pow'r to change this currish Jew.
Shakspeare.

She says your dog was a cur; and tells you, currish thanks is good enough for such a present. Shaksp.

To Cu'rry, kûr'rê. v. a. [corium, leather, Lat.]

1. To dress leather, by beating and rubbing it.
2. To beat; to drub; to thresh; to chastise.

A deep design in 't to divide
The well-affected that confide;
By setting brother against brother,
To claw and curry one another. Hudibras.

I may expect her to take care of her family, and curry her hide in case of refusal. Addison.

3. To rub a horse with a scratching instrument, so as to smooth his coat, and promote his flesh.

Frictions make the parts more fleshy and full; as we see both in men, and in the currying of horses: the cause is, for that they draw a greater quantity of spirits and blood to the parts. Bacon.

4. To scratch in kindness; to rub down with flattery; to tickle.

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men; if to his men, I would curry with master Shallow. Shakspeare.

5. To curry Favour. To become a favourite by petty officiousness, slight kindnesses, or flattery.

He judged them still over-abjectly to fawn upon the heathens, and to curry favour with infidels. Hooker.

This humour succeeded so with the puppy, that an ass would go the same way to work to curry favour for himself. L'Estrange.

Cu'rrycomb, kûr'rê-kôme. n. s. [from curry and comb.] An iron instrument used for currying or cleaning horses.

He has a clearer idea from a little print than from a long definition; and so he would have of strigil and sistrum, if instead of a currycomb and cymbal, he could see stamped in the margin small pictures of these instruments. Locke.

To Curse, kûrse. v. a. [cupjian, Sax.]

1. To wish evil to; to execrate; to devote.

Curse me this people, for they are too mighty for me. Numbers.

After Solyman had looked upon the dead body, and bitterly cursed the same, he caused a great weight to be tied unto it, and so cast into the sea. Knolles.

What, yet again! the third time hast thou curst me:
This imprecation was for Laius' death,
And thou hast wished me like him. Dryd. and Lee.

2. To mischief; to afflict; to torment.

On impious realms and barb'rous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse 'em with such sons as those. Pope.

To Curse, kûrse. v. n. To imprecate; to deny or affirm with imprecation of divine vengeance.

The silver about which thou cursedst, and speakest of also in my ears, behold the silver is with me. Jud. xvi. 2.

Curse, kûrse. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Malediction; wish of evil to another.

Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul. Job.

I never went from your lordship but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing. Dryden.

2. Affliction; torment; vexation.

Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!
Ambitiously sententious! Addison's Cato.

Cu'rsed, kûr'sêd.[362] participial adj. [from curse.]

1. Deserving a curse; hateful; detestable; abominable; wicked.

Merciful pow'rs!
Restrain in me the cursed thoughts that nature
Gives way to in repose. Shaksp. Macbeth.

2. Unholy; unsanctified; blasted by a curse.

Come, lady, while heav'n lends us grace,
Let us fly this cursed place,
Lest the sorcerer us entice
With some other new device;
Not a waste or needless sound,
Till we come to holier ground. Milton.

3. Vexatious; troublesome.

This cursed quarrel be no more renew'd;
Be, as becomes a wife, obedient still,
Though griev'd, yet subject to her husband's will.
Dryden.

One day, I think, in Paradise he liv'd;
Destin'd the next his journey to pursue,
Where wounding thorns and cursed thistles grew.
Prior.

Cu'rsedly, kûr'sêd-lê. adv. [from cursed.] Miserably; shamefully: a low cant word.

Satisfaction and restitution lies so cursedly hard on the gizzards of our publicans. L'Estrange.

Sure this is a nation that is cursedly afraid of being over-run with too much politeness, and cannot regain one great genius but at the expence of another. Pope.

Cu'rsedness, kûr'sêd-nês. n. s. [from cursed.] The state of being under a curse.

Cu'rship, kûr'ship. n. s. [from cur.] Dogship; meanness; scoundrelship.

How durst he, I say, oppose thy curship,
'Gainst arms, authority, and worship? Hudibras.

Cu'rsitor, kûr'sê-tûr. n. s. [Lat.] An officer or clerk belonging to the Chancery, that makes out original writs. They are called clerks of course, in the oath of the clerks of Chancery. Of these there are twenty-four in number, which have certain shires allotted to each of them, into which they make out such original writs as are required. They are a corporation among themselves. Cowell.

Then is the recognition and value, signed with the handwriting of that justice, carried by the cursitor in Chancery for that shire where those lands do lie, and by him is a writ of covenant thereupon drawn, and ingrossed in parchment. Bacon.

Cu'rsorary, kûr'sô-râ-rê. adj. [from cursus, Lat.] Cursory; hasty; careless. A word, I believe, only found in the following line.

I have but with a cursorary eye
O'erglanc'd the articles. Shaksp. Hen. V.

Cu'rsorily, kûr'sô-rê-lê. adv. [from cursory.] Hastily; without care; without solicitous attention.

This power, and no other, Luther disowns, as any one that views the place but cursorily must needs see. Atterbury.

Cu'rsoriness, kûr'sô-rê-nês. n. s. [from cursory.] Slight attention.

Cu'rsory, kûr'sô-rê. adj. [from cursorius, Lat.] Hasty; quick; inattentive; careless.

The first, upon a cursory and superficial view, appeared like the head of another man. Addison.

Curst, kûrst. adj. Froward; peevish; malignant; mischievous; malicious; snarling.

Mr. Mason, after his manner, was very merry with both parties; pleasantly playing both with the shrewd touches of many curst boys, and with the small discretion of many lewd schoolmasters. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

Curst cows have short horns. Proverbs.

I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,
Let her not hurt me: I was never curst;
I have no gift at all in shrewishness;
I am a right maid, for my cowardice;
Let her not strike me. Shaksp. Mids. Night's Dr.

I'll go see if the bear be gone from the gentleman, and how much he hath eaten: they are never curst but when they are hungry. Shaksp.

Her only fault, and that is fault enough,
Is, that she is intolerably curst,
And shrewd and froward, so beyond all measure,
That were my state far worser than it is,
I would not wed her for a mine of gold. Shaksp.

When I dissuaded him from his intent,
And from him pight to do it with curst speech,
I threaten'd to discover him. Shaksp.

And though his mind
Be ne'er so curst, his tongue is kind. Crashaw.

Cu'rstness, kûrst'nês. n. s. [from curst.] Peevishness, frowardness; malignity.

Then, noble partners,
Touch you the sourest points with sweetest terms,
Nor curstness grow to the matter. Shaksp.

Her mouth she writh'd, her forehead taught to frown,
Her eyes to sparkle fires to love unknown;
Her sallow cheeks her envious mind did shew,
And ev'ry feature spoke aloud the curstness of a shrew. Dryden.

Curt, kûrt. adj. [from curtus, Lat.] Short.

To Cu'rtail, kûr-tâle'. v. a. [curto, Lat. It was anciently written curtal, which perhaps is more proper; but dogs that had their tails cut being called curtal dogs, the word was vulgarly conceived to mean originally to cut the tail, and was in time written according to that notion.]

1. To cut off; to cut short; to shorten.

I, that am curtail'd of all fair proportion,
Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world. Shaksp. Richard III.

Then why should we ourselves abridge,
And curtail our own privilege? Hudibras.

Scribblers send us over their trash in prose and verse, with abominable curtailings and quaint modernisms. Swift.

This general employ, and expence of their time, would as assuredly curtail and retrench the ordinary means of knowledge and erudition, as it would shorten the opportunities of vice. Woodward.

Perhaps this humour of speaking no more than we must, has so miserably curtailed some of our words; and, in familiar writings and conversations, they often lose all but their first syllables. Addison.

2. It has of before the thing cut off.

The count assured the court, that Fact his antagonist had taken a wrong name, having curtailed it of three letters; for that his name was not Fact, but Faction. Addison.

CU'RTAIL Dog, kûr-tâle'dôg. n. s. A dog lawed, or mutilated according to the forest laws, whose tail is cut off, and who is therefore hindered in coursing. Perhaps this word may be the original of cur.

I, amazed, ran from her as a witch: and I think if my breast had not been made of faith, and my heart of steel, she had transformed me to a curtail dog, and made me turn i' th' wheel.
Shaksp. Comedy of Errours.

CU'RTAIN, kûr'tîn.[208] n. s. [cortina, Latin.]

1. A cloth contracted or expanded at pleasure, to admit or exclude the light; to conceal or discover any thing, to shade a bed; to darken a room.

Their curtains ought to be kept open, so as to renew the air. Arbuthnot on Diet.

Sol through white curtains shot a tim'rous ray,
And op'd those eyes that must eclipse the day.
Pope.

Thy hand, great Dulness! lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all. Pope.

2. To draw the Curtain. To close it, so as to shut out the light, or conceal the object.

I must draw a curtain before the work for a while, and keep your patience a little in suspense.
Burnet's Theory.

Once more I write to you, and this once will be the last: the curtain will soon be drawn between my friend and me, and nothing left but to wish you a long good night. Pope.

3. To open it, so as to discern the object.

So soon as the all-cheering sun
Should in the farthest east begin to draw
The shady curtain from Aurora's bed. Shaksp.

Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this stormy night be gone,
And th' eternal morrow dawn;
Then the curtain will be drawn. Crashaw.

4. [In fortification.] That part of the wall or rampart that lies between two bastions. Military Dict.

The governor, not discouraged, suddenly of timber and boards raised up a curtain twelve foot high at the back of his soldiers. Knolles.

CURTAIN-LECTURE, kûr'tîn-lêk'tshûre. n. s. [from curtain and lecture.] A reproof given by a wife to her husband in bed.

What endless brawls by wives are bred!
The curtain-lecture makes a mournful bed.
Dryden's Juvenal.

She ought to exert the authority of the curtain-lecture, and, if she finds him of a rebellious disposition, to tame him. Addison.

To CU'RTAIN, kûr'tîn. v. a. [from the noun.] To inclose or accommodate with curtains.

Now o'er one half the world
Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse
The curtain'd sleep. Shaksp. Macbeth.

The wand'ring prince and Dido,
When with a happy storm they were surpris'd,
And curtain'd with a counsel-keeping cave. Shak.

But, in her temple's last recess inclos'd,
On Dulness' lap th' anointed head repos'd:
Him close she curtain'd round with vapours blue,
And soft besprinkled with cimmerian dew. Pope.

CU'RTATE-Distance, kûr'tâte-dis'tânse. n. s. [In astronomy.] The distance of a planet's place from the sun, reduced to the ecliptick.

CURTA'TION, kûr-tâ'shûn. n. s. [from curto, to shorten, Lat.] The interval between a planet's distance from the sun and the curtate distance. Chambers.

CURVA'TION, kûr-vâ'shûn. n. s. [curvo, Lat.] The act of bending, or crooking.

CU'RVATURE, kûr'vâ-tûre.[461] n. s. [from curve.] Crookedness; inflexion; manner of bending.

It is bent after the manner of the catenarian curve, by which it obtains that curvature that is safest for the included marrow. Cheyne.

Flaccid it was beyond the activity of the muscle, and curvature of the ossicles, to give it a due tension. Holder.

CURVE, kûrv. adj. [curvus, Lat.] Crooked; bent; inflected; not straight.

Unless an intrinsick principle of gravity or attraction may make it describe a curve line about the attracting body. Bentley.

CURVE, kûrv. n. s. Any thing bent; a flexure or crookedness of any particular form.

And as you lead it round, in artful curve,
With eye intentive mark the springing game.
Thomson.

To CURVE, kûrv. v. a. [curvo, Lat.] To bend; to crook; to inflect.

And the tongue is drawn back and curved.
Holder.

To CURVE'T, kûr-vêt'. v. n. [corvettare, Ital.]

1. To leap; to bound.

Cry holla! to thy tongue, I pr'ythee: it curvets unseasonably. Shaksp. As you like it.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get,
So oft and high he did curvet,
Ere he himself could settle. Drayt. Nymphid.

Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with fright,
The wounded steed curvets; and, rais'd upright,
Lights on his feet before: his hoofs behind
Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind. Dryd.

2. To frisk; to be licentious.

CURVE'T, kûr-vêt'. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A leap; a bound.

2. A frolick; a prank.

CURVILI'NEAR, kûr-vè-lîn'yâr. adj. [curvus and linea, Lat.]

1. Consisting of a crooked line.

The impulse continually draws the celestial body from its rectilinear motion, and forces it into a curvilinear orbit; so that it must be repeated every minute of time. Cheyne.

2. Composed of crooked lines.

CU'RVITY, kûr'vè-tè. n. s. [from curve.] Crookedness.

The jointed ends of that bone and the incus receding, make a more acute angle at that joint, and give a greater curvity to the posture of the ossicles. Holder on Speech.

CU'SHION, kûsh'în or kûsh'ûn.[289] n. s. [kussen, Dut. coussin, Fr.] A pillow for the seat; a soft pad placed upon a chair.

Call Claudius, and some other of my men;
I'll have them sleep on cushions in my tent. Shak.

If you are learn'd,
Be not as common fools; if you are not,
Let them have cushions by you. Shak. Coriolanus.

But, ere they sat, officious Baucis lays
Two cushions stuff'd with straw, the seat to raise,
Coarse, but the best she had. Dryden's Fables.

An eastern king put a judge to death for an iniquitous sentence; and ordered his hide to be stuffed into a cushion, and placed upon the tribunal, for the son to sit on. Swift.

CU'SHIONED, kûsh'înd.[359] adj. [from cushion.] Seated on a cushion; supported by cushions.

Many, who are cushioned upon thrones, would have remained in obscurity. Dissertation on Parties.

CUSP, kûsp. n. s. [cuspis, Lat.] A term used to express the points or horns of the moon or other luminary. Harris.

CU'SPATED, kûs'pâ-têd. CU'SPIDATED, kûs'pè-dâ-têd. adj. [from cuspis, Lat.] A word expressing the leaves of a flower ending in a point. Quincy.

CU'STARD, kûs'tûrd.[88] n. s. [cwstard, Welsh.] A kind of sweetmeat made by boiling eggs with milk and sugar till the whole thickens into a mass. It is a food much used in city feasts.

He cramm'd them, till their guts did ake,
With cawdle, custard, and plumb cake Hudibras.

Now may'rs and shrieves all hush'd and satiate lay;
Yet eat, in dreams, the custard of the day. Pope.

CU'STODY, kûs'tô-dè. n. s. [custodia, Lat.]

1. Imprisonment; restraint of liberty.

The council remonstranced unto queen Elizabeth the conspiracies against her life, and therefore they advised her, that she should go less abroad weakly attended; but the queen answered, she had rather be dead than put in custody. Bacon.

For thus enslav'd, is custody severe,
And stripes, and arbitrary punishment
Inflicted? Milton's Par. Lost.

2. Care; gaurdianship; charge.

Under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari, shall be the boards of the tabernacle.
Numb. iii. 36.

We being strangers here, how dar'st thou trust
So great a charge from thine own custody? Shak.

An offence it were, rashly to depart out of the city committed to their custody. Knolles.

There is generally but one coin stampt upon the occasion, which is made a present to the person who is celebrated on it: by this means the whole fame is in his own custody. Addison.

3. Defence; preservation; security.

There was prepared a fleet of thirty ships for the custody of the narrow seas. Bacon.

CU'STOM, kûs'tûm.[166] n. s. [coustume, Fr.]

1. Habit; habitual practice.

Blood and destruction shall be so in use,
That mothers shall but smile when they behold
Their infants quarter'd by the hands of war;
All pity choak'd with custom of fell deeds. Shaksp.

Custom, a greater power than nature, seldom fails to make them worship. Locke.

2. Fashion; common way of acting.

And the priest's custom with the people was, that when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hands. 1 Sam. ii.

3. Established manner.

According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. Luke, i.

4. Practice of buying of certain persons.

You say he is assiduous in his calling, and is he not grown rich by it? Let him have your custom, but not your votes. Addison.

5. Application from buyers: as, this trader has good custom.

6. [In law.] A law or right not written, which, being established by long use, and the consent of our ancestors, has been, and is daily, practised. We cannot say that this or that is a custom, except we can justify that it hath continued so one hundred years; yet, because that is hard to prove, it is enough for the proof of a custom, if two or more can depose that they heard their fathers say, that it was a custom all their time, and that their fathers heard their fathers also say that it was likewise a custom in their time. If it is to be proved by record, the continuance of a hundred years will serve. Custom is either general or particular: general, that which is current through England; particular, is that which belongs to this or that county; as gavelkind to Kent, or this or that lordship, city, or town. Custom differs from prescription; for custom is common to more, and prescription is particular to this or that man: prescription may be for a far shorter time than custom. Cowell.

7. Tribute; tax paid for goods imported or exported.

The residue of these ordinary finances be casual or uncertain, as be the escheats and forfeitures, the customs, butlerage, and imposts. Bacon.

Those commodities may be dispersed, after having paid the customs in England. Temple.

Customs to steal is such a trivial thing,
That 'tis their charter to defraud their king. Dryd.

Strabo tells you, that Britain bore heavy taxes, especially the customs on the importation of the Gallick trade. Arbuthnot.

Cu'stomhouse, kŭs'tŭm-hŏŭse. n. s. The house where the taxes upon goods imported or exported are collected.

Some customhouse officers, birds of passage, and oppressive thrifty squires, are the only thriving people amongst us. Swift.

Cu'stomable, kŭs'tŭm-â-bl. adj. [from custom.] Common; habitual; frequent.

Cu'stomableness, kŭs-tŭm-â-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from customable.]

1. Frequency; habit.
2. Conformity to custom.

Cu'stomably, kŭs'tŭm-â-blĕ. adv. [from customable.] According to custom.

Kingdoms have customably been carried away by right of succession, according to proximity of blood. Hayward.

Cu'stomarily, kŭs'tŭm-âr-ĕ-lĕ. adv. [from customary.] Habitually; commonly.

To call God to witness truth, or a lye perhaps; or to appeal to him on every trivial occasion, in common discourse, customarily without consideration, is one of the highest indignities and affronts that can be offered him. Ray.

Cu'stomariness, kŭs'tŭm-âr-ĕ-nĕs. n. s. [from customary.] Frequency; commonness; frequent occurrence.

A vice which for its guilt may justify the sharpest, and for its customariness the frequentest, invectives which can be made against it. Government of the Tongue.

Cu'stomary, kŭs'tŭm-âr-ĕ. adj. [from custom.]

1. Conformable to established custom; according to prescription.

Pray you now, if it may stand with the tune of your voices, that I may be consul: I have here the customary gown. Shakspeare.

Several ingenious persons, whose assistance might be conducive to the advance of real and useful knowledge, lay under the prejudices of education and customary belief. Glanville's Scepsis.

2. Habitual.

We should avoid the profane and irreverent use of God's name, by cursing, or customary swearing; and take heed of the neglect of his worship, or any thing belonging to it. Tillotson.

3. Usual; wonted.

Ev'n now I met him
With customary compliment, when he,
Wafting his eyes to th' contrary, and falling
A lip of much contempt, speeds from me. Shaksp.

Cu'stomed, kŭs'tŭmd.[359] adj. [from custom.] Usual; common; that to which we are accustomed.

No nat'ral exhalation in the sky,
No common wind, no customed event,
But they will pluck away its nat'ral cause,
And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs. Shaksp. King John.

Cu'stomer, kŭs'tŭm-ŭr. n. s. [from custom.]

1. One who frequents any place of sale for the sake of purchasing.

One would think it Overdone's house; for here be many old customers. Shaksp. Meas. for Meas.

A wealthy poet takes more pains to hire
A flattering audience, than poor tradesmen do
To persuade customers to buy their goods. Roscommon.

Lord Strut has bespoke his liveries at Lewis Baboon's shop: Don't you see how that old fox steals away your customers, and turns you out of your business every day? Arbuthnot.

Those papers are grown a necessary part in coffeehouse furniture, and may be read by customers of all ranks for curiosity or amusement. Swift.

I shewed you a piece of black and white stuff, just sent from the dyer, which you were pleased to approve of, and be my customer for. Swift.

2. A common woman. This sense is now obsolete.

I marry her!—What, a customer? Pr'ythee bear some charity to my wit; do not think it so unwholesome. Shaksp. Othello.

Cu'strel, kŭs'trĕl. n. s.

1. A buckler-bearer.
2. A vessel for holding wine. Ainsworth.

To CUT, kŭt. v. a. pret. cut. part. pass. cut. [probably from the French couteau, a knife.]

1. To penetrate with an edged instrument; to divide any continuity by a sharp edge.

Ah, cut my lace asunder,
That my great heart may have some scope to beat,
Or else I swoon with this dead killing news. Shaksp. Richard III.

And when two hearts were join'd by mutual love,
The sword of justice cuts upon the knot,
And severs 'em for ever. Dryden.

Some I have cut away with scissars. Wiseman.

2. To hew.

Thy servants can skill to cut timber in Lebanon. 2 Chron. ii.

3. To carve; to make by sculpture.

Why should a man whose blood is warm within,
Sit like his grandsire cut in alabaster? Shaksp.

The triumphal is defaced by time; but the plan of it is neatly cut upon the wall of a neighbouring building. Addison.

4. To form any thing by cutting.

And they beat the gold into thin plates, and cut it into wires. Exod. xxxix. 3.

5. To divide by passing through.

Before the whistling winds the vessels fly,
With rapid swiftness cut the liquid way,
And reach Gerestus at the point of day. Pope.

6. To pierce with any uneasy sensation.

The man was cut to the heart with these consolations. Addison.

7. To divide packs of cards.

Supine they in their heav'n remain,
Exempt from passion and from pain;
And frankly leave us, human elves,
To cut and shuffle for ourselves. Prior.

We sure in vain the cards condemn,
Ourselves both cut and shuffled them. Prior.

Take a fresh pack, nor is it worth our grieving,
Who cuts or shuffles with our dirty leaving. Granville.

8. To intersect; to cross; as, one line cuts another at right angles.

9. To cut down. To fell; to hew down.

All the timber whereof was cut down in the mountains of Cilicia. Knolles.

10. To cut down. To excel; to overpower: a low phrase.

So great is his natural eloquence, that he cuts down the finest orator, and destroys the best contrived argument, as soon as ever he gets himself to be heard. Addison's Count Tariff.

11. To cut off. To separate from the other parts by cutting.

And they caught him, and cut off his thumbs. Jud. i. 6.

12. To cut off. To destroy; to extirpate; to put to death untimely.

All Spain was first conquered by the Romans, and filled with colonies from them, which were still increased, and the native Spaniards still cut off. Spenser on Ireland.

Were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands. Shaksp. Macbeth.

This great commander was suddenly cut off by a fatal stroke, given him with a small contemptible instrument. Howel.

Irenæus was likewise cut off by martyrdom. Addison.

Ill-fated prince! too negligent of life!
Cut off in the fresh ripening prime of manhood,
Even in the pride of life. Philips.

13. To cut off. To rescind; to separate; to take away.

Fetch the will hither, and we shall determine
How to cut off some charge in legacies. Shaksp.

He that cuts off twenty years of life,
Cuts off so many years of fearing death. Shaksp.

Presume not on thy God, whoe'er he be;
Thee he regards not, owns not, hath cut off
Quite from his people. Milton's Agonistes.

The proposal of a recompence from men, cuts off the hopes of future rewards. Smalridge.

14. To cut off. To intercept; to hinder from union or return.

The king of this island, a wise man and a great warrior, handled the matter so, as he cut off their land forces from their ships. Bacon.

His party was so much inferior to the enemy, that it would infallibly be cut off. Clarendon.

15. To cut off. To put an end to; to obviate.

To cut off contentions, commissioners were appointed to make certain the limits. Hayward.

It may compose our unnatural feuds, and cut off frequent occasions of brutal rage and intemperance. Addison.

16. To cut off. To withhold.

We are concerned to cut off all occasion from those who seek occasion, that they may have whereof to accuse us. Rogers.

17. To cut off. To preclude.

Every one who lives in the practice of any voluntary sin, actually cuts himself off from the benefits and profession of christianity. Addison.

This only object of my real care,
Cut off from hope, abandon'd to despair,
In some few posting fatal hours is hurl'd
From wealth, from pow'r, from love, and from the world. Prior.

Why should those who wait at altars be cut off from partaking in the general benefits of law, or of nature. Swift.

18. To cut off. To interrupt; to silence.

It is no grace to a judge to shew quickness of conceit in cutting off evidence or counsel too short. Bacon.

19. To cut off. To apostrophise; to abbreviate.

No vowel can be cut off before another, when we cannot sink the pronunciation of it. Dryden.

20. To cut out. To shape; to form.

By the pattern of mine own thoughts I cut out the purity of his. Shaksp. Winter's Tale.

I, for my part, do not like images cut out in juniper, or other garden stuff: they be for children. Bacon.

There is a large table at Montmorency cut out of the thickness of a vine stock. Temple.

The antiquaries being but indifferent taylors, they wrangle prodigiously about the cutting out the toga. Arbuthnot.

They have a large forest cut out into walks, extremely thick and gloomy. Addison.

21. To cut out. To scheme; to contrive.

Having a most pernicious fire kindled within the very bowels of his own forest, he had work enough cut him out to extinguish it. Howel.

Every man had cut out a place for himself in his own thoughts: I could reckon up in our army two or three lord-treasurers. Addison.

22. To cut out. To adapt.

You know I am not cut out for writing a treatise, nor have a genius to pen any thing exactly. Rymer.

23. To cut out. To debar.

I am cut out from any thing but common acknowledgments, or common discourse. Pope.

24. To cut out. To excel; to outdo.

25. To cut short. To hinder from proceeding by sudden interruption.

Thus much he spoke, and more he would have said,
But the stern hero turn'd aside his head,
And cut him short. Dryden's Æneid.

Achilles cut him short; and thus replied,
My worth, allow'd in words, is in effect denied. Dryden.

26. To cut short. To abridge: as, the soldiers were cut short of their pay.

27. To cut up. To divide an animal into convenient pieces.

The boar's intemperance, and the note upon him afterwards, on the cutting him up, that he had no brains in his head, may be moralized into a sensual man. L'Estrange.

28. To cut up. To eradicate.

Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper-roots for their meat. Job.

This doctrine cuts up all government by the roots. Locke.

To Cut, kůt. v. n.

1. To make way by dividing; to divide by passing through.

When the teeth are ready to cut, the upper part is rubbed with hard substances, which infants, by a natural instinct, affect. Arbuthnot.

2. To perform the operation of lithotomy.

He saved the lives of thousands by his manner of cutting for the stone. Pope.

3. To interfere: as, a horse that cuts.

Cut, kůt. part. adj. Prepared for use: a metaphor from hewn timber.

Sets of phrases, cut and dry,
Evermore thy tongue supply. Swift.

Cut, kůt. n. s. [from the noun.]

1. The action of a sharp or edged instrument; the blow of an ax or sword.

2. The impression or separation of continuity, made by an edge or sharp instrument: distinguished from that made by perforation with a pointed instrument.

3. A wound made by cutting.

Sharp weapons, according to the force, cut into the bone many ways; which cuts are called sedes, and are reckoned among the fractures. Wiseman.

4. A channel made by art.

This great cut or ditch Sesostris the rich king of Egypt, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purposed to have made a great deal wider and deeper, and thereby to have let the Red Sea into the Mediterranean. Knolles.

5. A part cut off from the rest.

Suppose a board to be ten foot long, and one broad, one cut is reckoned so many foot. Mortimer.

6. A small particle; a shred.

It hath a number of short cuts or shreddings, which may be better called wishes than prayers. Hooker.

7. A lot made by cutting a stick.

My lady Zelmane and my daughter Mopsa may draw cuts, and the shortest cut speak first. Sidney.

A man may as reasonably draw cuts for his tenets, and regulate his persuasion by the cast of a die. Locke.

8. A near passage, by which some angle is cut off.

The ignorant took heart to enter upon this great calling, and instead of their cutting their way to it through the knowledge of the tongues, the fathers, and councils, they have taken another and a shorter cut. South.

There is a shorter cut, an easier passage. Decay of Piety.

The evidence of my sense is simple and immediate, and therefore I have but a shorter cut thereby to the assent to the truth of the things so evidenced. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

But the gentleman would needs see me part of my way, and carry me a short cut through his own ground, which saved me half a mile's riding. Swift's Examiner.

9. A picture cut or carved upon wood or copper, and impressed from it.

In this form, according to his description, he is set forth in the prints or cuts of martyrs by Cevallerius. Brown.

It is, I believe, used improperly by Addison.

Madam Dacier, from some old cuts of Terence, fancies that the larva or persona of the Roman actors was not only a vizard for the face, but had false hair to it. Addison on Italy.

10. The stamp on which a picture is carved, and by which it is impressed.

11. The act or practice of dividing a pack of cards.

How can the muse her aid impart,
Unskilled in all the terms of art?
Or in harmonious numbers put
The deal, the shuffle, and the cut? Swift.

12. Fashion; form; shape; manner of cutting into shape.

Their clothes are after such a pagan cut too,
That, sure, they 've worn out Christendom. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

His tawny beard was th' equal grace
Both of his wisdom and his face;
In cut and dye so like a tile,
A sudden view it would beguile. Hudibras.

They were so familiarly acquainted with him, as to know the very cut of his beard. Stillingfleet.

Children love breeches, not for their cut or ease, but because the having them is a mark or step towards manhood. Locke.

A third desires you to observe well the toga on such a reverse; and asks you whether you can in conscience believe the sleeve of it to be of the true Roman cut. Addison.

Sometimes an old fellow shall wear this or that sort of cut in his cloaths with great integrity. Addison's Spectator.

Wilt thou buy there some high heads of the newest cut for my daughter? Arbuthnot.

13. It seems anciently to have signified a fool or cully. To cut still signifies to cheat, in low language.

Send her money, knight: if thou hast her not in the end, call me cut. Shaksp. Twelfth Night.

14. Cut and long tail. A proverbial expression for men of all kinds. It is borrowed from dogs.

He will maintain you like a gentlewoman——
Ay, that I will, come cut and long tail, under the degree of a squire. Shaksp.

At quintain he,
In honour of this bridaltee,
Hath challeng'd either wide countee.
Come cut and long tail for there be Six bachelors as bold as he. Ben Jonson.

Cuta'neous, ků-tā'nė-ůs. adj. [from cutis, Lat.] Relating to the skin.

The serous, nutritious mass is more readily circulated into the cutaneous or remotest parts of the body. Floyer on Humours.

Some sorts of cutaneous eruptions are occasioned by feeding much on acid unripe fruits and farinaceous substances. Arbuthnot.

Cu'ticle, ků'tė-kl.[405] n. s. [cuticula, Lat.]

1. The first and outermost covering of the body, commonly called the scarf-skin. This is that soft skin which rises in a blister upon any burning, or the application of a blistering plaster. It sticks close to the surface of the true skin to which it is also tied by the vessels which nourish it, though they are so small as not to be seen. When the scarf-skin is examined with a microscope, it appears to be made up of several lays of exceeding small scales. Quincy.

In each of the very fingers there are bones and gristles, and ligaments and membranes, and muscles and tendons, and nerves and arteries, and veins and skin, and cuticle and nail. Bentley.

2. A thin skin formed on the surface of any liquor.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they concreted, floated in the liquor at equal distances in rank and file. Newton's Opticks.

Cuti'cular, ků-tik'ů-lůr. adj. [from cutis, Lat.] Belonging to the skin.

Cuth, kůth. signifies knowledge or skill. So Cuthwin is a knowing conqueror;

Cuthred, a knowing counsellor; Cuthbert, famous for skill. Much of the same nature are Sophocles and Sophianus. Gibson's Camden.

CU'TLASS, kŭt'lăs. n. s. [coutelas, Fr. This word is written sometimes cutlace, sometimes cuttleax; in Shakspeare, curtleaxe; and in Pope, cutlash.] A broad cutting sword: the word is much in use among the seamen.

Were't not better
That I did suit me all points like a man?
A gallant curtleaxe upon my thigh,
A boar-spear in my hand. Shaksp. As you like it.

To the lodgments of his herd he run,
Where the fat porkets slept beneath the sun;
Of two his cutlash launch'd the spouting blood,
These quarter'd, sing'd, and fix'd on forks of wood. Pope.

CU'TLER, kŭt'lŭr.[98] n. s. [coutelier, Fr.] One who makes or sells knives.

A paultry ring
That she did give, whose poesy was
For all the world like cutlers poetry
Upon a knife; love me, and leave me not. Shak.

In a bye cutler's shop he bought a tenpenny knife: so cheap was the instrument of this great attempt. Wotton.

He chose no other instrument than an ordinary knife, which he bought of a common cutler. Clarendon.

CU'TPURSE, kŭt'pŭrse. n. s. [cut and purse.] One who steals by the method of cutting purses: a common practice when men wore their purses at their girdles, as was once the custom. A thief; a robber.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse. Shaksp.

A vice of kings,
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Was there no felony, no bawd,
Cutpurse, nor burglary abroad? Hudibras.

If we could imagine a whole nation to be cutpurses and robbers, would there then be kept that square dealing and equity in such a monstrous den of thieves? Bentley's Sermons.

CU'TTER, kŭt'tŭr.[98] n. s. [from cut.]

1. An agent or instrument that cuts any thing.
2. A nimble boat that cuts the water.
3. [Incisores.] The teeth that cut the meat.

The molares, or grinders, are behind, nearest the centre of motion, because there is a greater strength or force required to chew the meat than to bite a piece; and the cutters before, that they may be ready to cut off a morsel from any solid food, to be transmitted to the grinders. Ray.

4. An officer in the Exchequer that provides wood for the tallies, and cuts the sum paid upon them; and then casts the same into the court to be written upon. Cowell.

CU'T-THROAT, kŭt'*th*rōte. n. s. [cut and throat.] A ruffian; a murderer; a butcher of men; an assassin.

Will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people, gathered out of all the corners of Christendom, to waste your countries, spoil your cities, murder your people, and trouble all your seas? Knolles.

Perhaps the cut-throat may rather take his copy from the Parisian massacre, one of the horridest instances of barbarous inhumanity that ever was known. South.

The ruffian robbers by no justice aw'd
And unpaid cut-throat soldiers are abroad;
Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,
To save complaints and prosecution, kill. Dryden.

CU'T-THROAT, kŭt'*th*rōte. adj. Cruel; inhuman; barbarous.

If to take above fifty in the hundred be extremity, this in truth can be none other than cut-throat and abominable dealing. Carew.

CU'TTING, kŭt'ting. n. s. [from cut.] A piece cut off; a chop.

The burning of the cuttings of vines, and casting them upon land, doth much good. Bacon.

Many are propagated above ground by slips or cuttings. Ray.

CU'TTLE, kŭt'tl.[405] n. s. [sepia.] A fish, which, when he is pursued by a fish of prey, throws out a black liquor, by which he darkens the water and escapes.

It is somewhat strange, that the blood of all birds, and beasts, and fishes, should be of a red colour, and only the blood of the cuttle should be as black as ink. Bacon.

He that uses many words for the explaining any subject, doth, like the cuttle fish, hide himself for the most part in his own ink. Ray on the Creation.

CU'TTLE, kŭt'tl. n. s. [from cuttle.] A foul-mouthed fellow; a fellow who blackens the character of others. Hanmer.

Away, you cutpurse rascal; you filthy bung, away: by this wine I'll thrust my knife in your mouldy chaps, if you play the saucy cuttle with me. Shaksp. Henry IV.

CY'CLE, sī'kl.[405] n. s. [syclus, Lat. κύκλος.]

1. A circle.
2. A round of time; a space in which the same revolutions begin again; a periodical space of time.

We do more commonly use these words, so as to stile a lesser space a cycle, and a greater by the name of period; and you may not improperly call the beginning of a large period the epocha thereof. Holder on Time.

3. A method, or account of a method, continued till the same course begins again.

We thought we should not attempt an unacceptable work, if here we endeavoured to present our gardeners with a complete cycle of what is requisite to be done throughout every month in the year. Evelyn's Kalendar.

4. Imaginary orbs; a circle in the heavens.

How build, unbuild, contrive
To save appearances; how gird the sphere
With centrick and excentrick, scribbled o'er
Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb! Milton.

CY'CLOID, sī'klŏid. n. s. [from κυκλοειδης, of κυκλος, and εἶδος shape.] A geometrical curve, of which the genesis may be conceived by imagining a nail in the circumference of a wheel; the line which the nail describes in the air, while the wheel revolves in a right line, is the cycloid.

CYCLO'IDAL, sē-klŏid'ăl. adj. [from cycloid.] Relating to a cycloid; as the cycloidal space, is the space contained between the cycloid and its substance. Chambers.

CYCLOPÆ'DIA, sī-klō-pē'dē-ă. n. s. [κυκλος and παιδεία.] A circle of knowledge; a course of the sciences.

CY'GNET, sĭg'nĕt. n. s. [from cycnus, Lat.] A young swan.

I am the cygnet to this pale faint swan,
Who chants a doleful hymn to his own death.
Shakspeare.

So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them pris'ners underneath her wings.
Shaksp. Henry VI.

Cygnets, from grey, turn white. Bacon.

Young cygnets are good meat, if fatted with oats; but, fed with weeds, they taste fishy. Mortimer.

CY'LINDER, sĭl'ĭn-dŭr. n. s. [κυλινδρος.] A body having two flat surfaces and one circular.

The quantity of water which every revolution does carry, according to any inclination of the cylinder, may be easily found. Wilkins.

The square will make you ready for all manner of compartments, bases, pedestals, plots, and buildings; your cylinder, for vaulted turrets, and round buildings. Peacham.

CYLI'NDRICAL, sē-lĭn'drē-kăl. } adj. [from CYLI'NDRICK, sē-lĭn'drĭk. } cylinder.] Partaking of the nature of a cylinder; having the form of a cylinder.

Minera ferri stalactitia, when several of the cylindrick striæ are contiguous, and grow together into one sheaf, is called brushiron ore. Woodward.

Obstructions must be most incident to such parts of the body where the circulation and the elastick fibres are both smallest, and those glands, which are the extremities of arteries formed into cylindrical canals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CYMA'R, sē-mär'. n. s. [properly written simar.] A slight covering; a scarf.

Her comely limbs compos'd with decent care,
Her body shaded with a slight cymar;
Her bosom to the view was only bare. Dryden.

CYMA'TIUM, sī-mā'shē-ŭm. n. s. [Lat. from κυμάτιον, a little wave.] A member of architecture, whereof one half is convex, and the other concave. There are two sorts, of which one is hollow below, as the other is above. Harris.

In a cornice, the gola, or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions, or dentelli, make a noble shew by their graceful projections. Spectator.

CY'MBAL, sĭm'băl. n. s. [cymbalum, Lat.] A musical instrument.

The trumpets, sackbuts, psalteries and fifes,
Tabors and cymbals, and the shouting Romans,
Make the sun dance. Shaksp.

If mirth should fail, I'll busy her with cares,
Silence her clamorous voice with louder wars;
Trumpets and drums shall fright her from the throne,
As sounding cymbals aid the lab'ring moon. Dryd.

CYNA'NTHROPY, sē-năn'*th*rō-pē. n. s. [κυων, κυνος, and ανθρωπος.] A species of madness in which men have the qualities of dogs.

CYNARCTO'MACHY, sē-närk-tŏm'ă-kē. [κυων, αρκτος μαχη.] A word coined by Butler, to denote bear baiting with a dog.

That some occult design doth lie
In bloody cynarctomachy,
Is plain enough to him that knows
How saints lead brothers by the nose. Hudibras.

CYNEGE'TICKS, sĭn-nē-jĕ'tĭks. n. s. [κυνεγητικα.] The art of hunting; the art of training and hunting with dogs.

There are extant, in Greek, four books of cynegeticks, or venation. Brown's Vulg. Errours.

CY'NICAL, sĭn'ĭk-ăl. } adj. [κυνικος.] Having CY'NICK, sĭn'ĭk } the qualities of a dog; currish; brutal; snarling; satirical.

He doth believe that some new-fangled wit (it is his cynical phrase) will some time or other find out his art. Wilkins.

CY'NICK, sĭn'nĭk. n. s. [κυνικος.] A philosopher of the snarling or currish sort; a follower of Diogenes; a rude man; a snarler; a misanthrope.

How vilely doth this cynick rhime!—
Get you hence, sirrah; saucy fellow, hence. Shak.

Without these precautions the man degenerates into a cynick, the woman into a coquette; the man grows sullen and morose, the woman impertinent and fantastical. Addison.

CY'NOSURE, sĭn'ō-sûre, or sī'nō-sûre.[535 537 503] n. s. [from κύων ουρα.] The star near the north pole, by which sailors steer.

Towers and battlements it sees
Bosom'd high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes. Milton.

CY'ON, sī'ŭn.[166] See CION.

CY'PRESS-TREE, sī'prĕs-trēē. n. s. [cupressus, Lat.]

1. The cypress is a tall straight tree, produced with great difficulty. Its fruit is of no use; its leaves are bitter, and the very smell and shade of it are dangerous. Hence the Romans looked upon it to be a fatal tree, and made use of it at funerals, and in mournful ceremonies. The cypress-tree is always green, and never either rots or is worm-eaten. Calmet.

In ivory coffers I have stuff'd my crowns;
In cypress chests my arras counterpanes. Shaksp.

He taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest. Isa. xliv. 14.

Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragrant shade. Pope.

2. Being anciently used in funerals, it is the emblem of mourning.

Poison be their drink,
Their sweetest shade a grove of cypress trees. Shak.

CY'PRUS, sī'prŭs. n. s. [I suppose from the place where it was made; or corruptly from cypress, as being used in mourning.] A thin transparent black stuff.

Lawn as white as driven snow,
Cypress black as e'er was crow. Shaksp.

A cypress, not a bosom,
Hides my poor heart! Shaksp.

CYST, sĭst. } n. s. [κυστις.] A bag
CY'STIS, sĭs'tĭs. } containing some morbid matter.

In taking it out, the cystis broke, and shewed itself by its matter to be a meliceris. Wiseman.

There may be a consumption, with a purulent spitting, when the vomica is contained in a cyst or bag; upon the breaking of which the patient is commonly suffocated. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CY'STICK, sĭs'tĭk. adj. [from cyst, a bag.] Contained in a bag.

The bile is of two sorts: the cystick, or that contained in the gall-bladder, a sort of repository for the gall; or the hepatick, or what flows immediately from the liver. Arbuthnot.

CYSTO'TOMY, sĭs-tŏt'tō-mē.[518] n. s. [κυστις and τεμνω.] The act or practice of opening encysted tumours, or cutting the bag in which any morbid matter is contained.

CZAR, zär. n. s. [a Sclavonian word, written more properly tzar.] The title of the emperour of Russia.

CZARI'NA, zä-rē'nä. n. s. [from tzar.] The empress of Russia.

D.

D, Is a consonant nearly approaching in sound to T, but formed by a stronger appulse of the tongue to the upper part of the mouth. The sound of D in English is uniform, and it is never mute.

DA CAPO, dä-kä'pō. [Ital.] A term in musick, which signifying from the head or the beginning, means that the first part of the tune should be repeated at the conclusion.

To DAB, dăb. v. a. [dauber, Fr.] To strike gently with something soft or moist.

A sore should never be wiped by drawing a piece of tow or rag over it, but only by dabbing it with fine lint. Sharp.

DAB, dăb. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A small lump of any thing.
2. A blow with something moist or soft.
3. Something moist or slimy thrown upon one.
4. [In low language.] An artist; a man expert at something. This is not used in writing.
5. A kind of small flat fish.

Of flat fish there are rays, flowks, dabs, plaice. Carew.

DA'B-CHICK, dăb'tshĭk. n. s. [colymbus.] A small water fowl, called likewise Dobchick, and Didapper, and Dipchick. Ray.

A dab-chick waddles through the copse
On feet and wings, and flies, and wades, and hops. Pope.

To DA'BBLE, dăb'bl.[405] v. a. [dabbelen, Dut.] To smear; to daub; to spatter; to besprinkle; to wet.

A shadow like an angel, with bright hair
Dabbled in blood. Shaksp. Richard III.

I scarified, and dabbled the wound with oil of turpentine. Wiseman's Surgery.

Mean while the South, rising with dabbled wings,
A sable cloud athwart the welkin flings. Swift.

To DA'BBLE, dăb'bl. v. n.

1. To play in water; to move in water or mud.

Neither will a spirit, that dwells with stars, dabble in this impurer mud. Glanville's Apol.

The little one complained of her legs, that she could neither swim nor dabble with them. L'Estr.

But when he found the boys at play,
And saw them dabbling in their clay,
He stood behind a stall to lurk,
And mark the progress of their work. Swift.

2. To do any thing in a slight, superficial, or shallow manner; to tamper.

Shakspeare shall be put into your hands as clear and as fair as it came out of them; though you, I think, have been dabbling here and there with the text, I have had more reverence for the writer and the printer, and left every thing standing. Atterbury to Pope.

DA'BBLER, dăb'lûr. n. s. [from dabble.]

1. One that plays in water.
2. One that meddles without mastery; one that never goes to the bottom of an affair; a superficial meddler.

He dares not complain of the tooth-ache, lest our dabblers in politicks should be ready to swear against him for disaffection. Swift.

DACE, dāse. n. s. [of uncertain derivation: in most provinces called dare. Leuciscus.] A small river fish, resembling a roach, but less.

Let me live harmlessly, and near the brink
Of Trent or Avon have a dwelling place;
Where I may see my quill or cork down sink
With eager bite of pearch, or bleak, or dace.
Walton.

DA'CTYLE, dăk'tĭl.[145] n. s. [δακτυλος, a finger.] A poetical foot consisting of one long syllable and two short, like the joints of a finger; as cāndĭdŭs.

DAD, dăd. } n. s. [The child's way
DA'DDY, dăd'dē. } of expressing father.

It is remarkable, that, in all parts of the world, the word for father, as first taught to children, is compounded of a and t, or the kindred letter d, differently placed; as tad, Welsh; ατ]α, Gr. atta, Gothick; tata, Lat. Father.

I was never so bethumpt with words,
Since first I call'd my brother's father dad. Shaksp.

His loving mother left him to my care;
Fine child, as like his dad as he could stare! Gay.

To DADE, dāde. v. a. To hold up by a leading string

The little children when they learn to go,
By painful mothers daded to and fro. Drayton.

DÆDAL, dē'dăl. adj. [dædalus, Lat.]

1. Various; variegated.
2. Skilful: this is not the true meaning, nor should be imitated.

Nor hath
The dædal hand of Nature only pour'd
Her gifts of outward grace. Philips.

DA'FFODIL, dăf'fō-dĭl.
DAFFODI'LLY, dăf-fō-dĭl'lē.
DAFFODOWNDI'LLY, dăf-fō-dŏŭn-dĭl'lē.

n. s. [Supposed by Skinner to be corrupted from asphodelus.]

This plant hath a lily-flower, consisting of one leaf, which is bell-shaped, and cut into six segments, which incircle its middle like a crown; but the empalement, which commonly rises out of a membranous vagina, turns to an oblong or roundish fruit, which is triangular, and gapes in three parts; is divided into three cells, and full of roundish seeds. Miller.

Strew me the green ground with daffodowndillies,
And cowslips, and kingcups, and loved lilies.
Spenser.

Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate herse where Lycid lies.
Milton.

The daughters of the flood have search'd the mead
For violets pale, and cropp'd the poppy's head:
The short narcissus, and fair daffodil,
Pancies to please the sight, and cassia sweet to smell. Dryden.

To DAFT, dåft. v. a. [contracted from do aft; that is, to throw back, to throw off.] To toss aside; to put away with contempt; to throw away slightly. Not now in use.

The nimble-footed mad-cap prince of Wales,
And his comrades, that daft the world aside,
And bid it pass. Shaksp. Henry IV.

I would she had bestow'd this dotage on me: I would have daft all other respects, and made her half myself. Shaksp.

DAG, dåg. n. s. [dague, Fr.]

1. A dagger.
2. A handgun; a pistol: so called from serving the purposes of a dagger, being carried secretly, and doing mischief suddenly. It is in neither sense now used.

To DAG, dåg. v. a. [from daggle.] To daggle; to bemire; to let fall in the water: a low word.

DA'GGER, dåg'ûr.[98] [381] n. s. [dague, Fr.]

1. A short sword; a poniard.

She ran to her son's dagger, and struck herself a mortal wound. Sidney.

This sword a dagger had his page,
That was but little for his age;
And therefore waited on him so
As dwarfs upon knights-errant do. Hudibras.

He strikes himself with his dagger; but being interrupted by one of his friends, he stabs him, and breaks the dagger on one of his ribs. Addison.

2. [In fencing schools.] A blunt blade of iron with a basket hilt, used for defence.
3. [With printers.] The obelus; a mark of reference in form of a dagger; as [†].

DA'GGERSDRAWING, dåg'ûrz-drâw-ing. n. s. [dagger and draw.] The act of drawing daggers; approach to open violence.

They always are at daggersdrawing,
And one another clapperclawing. Hudibras.

I have heard of a quarrel in a tavern, where all were at daggersdrawing, till one desired to know the subject of the quarrel. Swift.

To DA'GGLE, dåg'gl.[405] v. a. [from dag, dew; a word, according to Mr. Lye, derived from the Danish; according to Skinner, from ᵭaȝ, sprinkled, or ᵭeaȝan, to dip. They are probably all of the same root.] To dip negligently in mire or water; to bemire; to besprinkle.

To DA'GGLE, dåg'gl. v. n. To be in the mire; to run through wet or dirt.

Nor like a puppy, daggled through the town,
To fetch and carry sing-song up and down. Pope.

DA'GGLEDTAIL, dåg'gl-tâle. adj. [daggle and tail] Bemired; dipped in the water or mud; bespattered.

The gentlemen of wit and pleasure are apt to be choaked at the sight of so many daggletail parsons, that happen to fall in their way. Swift.

DA'ILY, dâ'lê. adj. [ᵭaȝlic, Sax.] Happening every day, or very frequently; done every day; quotidian.

Much are we bound to heaven
In daily thanks, that gave us such a prince. Shak.

Cease, man of woman born! to hope relief
From daily trouble, and continued grief. Prior.

DA'ILY, dâ'lê. adv. Every day; very often.

Let that man with better sense advise,
That of the world least part to us is read;
And daily how through hardy enterprize
Many great regions are discovered. Fairy Queen.

A man with whom I conversed almost daily for years together. Dryden.

DAI'NTILY, dâne'tê-lê. adv. [from dainty.]

1. Elegantly: delicately.

Truth is a naked and open day-light, that doth not shew the masks and mummeries and triumphs of the world, half so stately and daintily as candle-light. Bacon.

2. Deliciously; pleasantly.

There is no region on earth so daintily watered, with such great navigable rivers. Howel.

Those young suitors had been accustomed to nothing but to sleep well; and fare daintily. Broome.

3. Nicely; ceremoniously; scrupulously.
4. Squeamishly; fastidiously.

DA'INTINESS, dâne'tê-nês. n. s. [from dainty.]

1. Delicacy; softness.

What should yet thy palate please?
Daintiness and softer ease,
Sleeked limbs and finest blood? Ben Jonson.

2. Elegance; nicety.

The duke exceeded in the daintiness of his leg and foot, and the earl in the fine shape of his hands. Wotton.

3. Delicacy; deliciousness.

It was more notorious for the daintiness of the provision which he served in it, than for the massiness of the dish. Hakewill on Providence.

4. Squeamishness; fastidiousness.

Of sand, and lime, and clay, Vitruvius hath discoursed without any daintiness. Wotton.

5. Ceremoniousness; scrupulosity.

DA'INTY, dâne'tê. adj. [derived by Skinner from dain, an old French word for delicate; which yet I cannot find in dictionaries.]

1. Pleasing to the palate; of exquisite taste; delicious.

Higher concoction is required for sweetness, or pleasure of taste, and therefore all your dainty plumbs are a little dry. Bacon.

2. Delicate; of acute sensibility; nice; squeamish; soft; luxurious; tender.

This is the slowest, yet the daintiest sense;
For ev'n the ears of such as have no skill
Perceive a discord, and conceive offence;
And knowing not what's good, yet find the ill.
Davies.

They were a fine and dainty people; frugal and yet elegant, though not military. Bacon.

3. Scrupulous; ceremonious.

Which of you all
Will now deny to dance? She that makes dainty,
I'll swear hath corns. Shaksp. Romeo and Juliet.

Therefore to horse;
And let us not be dainty of leave-taking,
But shift away. Shaksp. Macbeth.

4. Elegant; tenderly, languishing, or effeminately beautiful,

My house within the city,
Is richly furnished with plate and gold,
Basons and ewers, to lave her dainty hands. Shak.

Why should ye be so cruel to yourself,
And to those dainty limbs, which nature lent
For gentle usage and soft delicacy? Milton.

5. Nice; affectedly fine: in contempt.

Your dainty speakers have the curse,
To plead bad causes down to worse. Prior.

DA'INTY, dâne'tê. n. s.

1. Something nice or delicate; a delicacy; something of exquisite taste.

Be not desirous of his dainties; for they are deceitful meat. Proverbs, xxiii. 3.

A worm breedeth in meal, of the shape of a large white maggot, which is given as a great dainty to nightingales. Bacon.

She then produc'd her dairy store,
And unbought dainties of the poor. Dryden.

The shepherd swains, with sure abundance blest,
On the fat flock and rural dainties feast. Pope.

2. A word of fondness formerly in use.

Why, that's my dainty; I shall miss thee:
But yet thou shalt have freedom. Shak. Tempest.

There is a fortune coming
Towards you, dainty, that will take thee thus,
And set thee aloft. Ben Jonson.

DA'IRY, dâ'rê. n. s. [from dey, an old word for milk. Mr. Lye.]

1. The occupation or art of making various kinds of food from milk.

Grounds were turned much in England either to feeding or dairy; and this advanced the trade of English butter. Temple.

2. The place where milk is manufactured.

You have no more worth
Than the coarse and country fairy,
That doth haunt the hearth or dairy. Ben Jonson.

What stores my dairies and my folds contain!
A thousand lambs that wander on the plain. Dryd.

She in pens his flocks will fold,
And then produce her dairy store. Dryden.

3. Pasturage; milk farm; ground where milch cattle are kept.

Dairies, being well housewived, are exceeding commodious. Bacon.

Children, in dairy countries, do wax more tall than where they feed more upon bread and flesh. Bacon.

DAI'RYMAID, dâ'rê-mâde. n. s. [dairy and maid.] The woman servant whose business is to manage the milk.

The poorest of the sex have still an itch
To know their fortunes equal to the rich:
The dairymaid enquires if she shall take
The trusty taylor, and the cook forsake. Dryd.

Come up quickly, or we shall conclude that thou art in love with one of Sir Roger's dairymaids. Add.

DAI'SY, dâ'zê.[438] n. s. [ᵭæȝeȝeaȝe, day's eye. Chaucer.] A spring flower.

It hath a perennial root: the stalks are naked, and never branch out: the cup of the flower is scaly and simple, divided into many segments to the foot-stalk. The flowers are radiated; and the heads, after the petals are fallen off, resemble obtuse cones. Miller.

When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And lady smocks all over white,
And cuckoo buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows much bedight. Shaksp.

As he passed, the woods put forth their blossoms, the earth her primroses and days-eyes, to behold him. Howel.

Now hawthorns blossom, now the daisies spring;
Now leaves the trees, and flow'rs adorn the ground
Pope.

This will find thee picking of daisies, or smelling to a lock of hay. Addison.

Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace;
The daisy, primrose, violet. Thomson.

DALE, dâle. n. s. [dalr, Gothick; dal, Dut. and Germ.] A low place between hills; a vale; a valley.

Long tost with storms, and beat with bitter winds,
High over hills, and low adown the dale,
She wand'red many a wood, and measur'd many a vale. Fairy Queen.

Before the downfall of the fairy state,
This dale, a pleasing region not unblest,
This dale possess'd they, and had still possess'd.
Tickell.

He steals along the lonely dale. Thomson.

DA'LLIANCE, dâl'lė-ânse. n. s. [from dally.]

1. Interchange of caresses; acts of fondness.

Look thou be true: do not give dalliance
Too much the rein: the strongest oaths are straw
To th' fire i' th' blood. Shaksp. Tempest.

Nor gentle purpose, nor endearing smiles,
Wanted; nor youthful dalliance, as beseems
Fair couple link'd in happy nuptial league,
Alone as they. Milton.

I'll head my people;
Then think of dalliance when the danger's o'er:
My warlike spirits work now another way,
And my soul's tun'd to trumpets. Dryden.

2. Conjugal conversation.

The giant, self-dismayed with the sound,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance found,
In haste came rushing forth from inner bow'r.
Fairy Queen.

That bower not mystick, where the sapient king
Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse.
Milton.

Thou claim'st me for thy sire,
And my fair son here show'st me, the dear pledge
Of dalliance had with thee in heav'n. Milton.

3. Delay; procrastination.

Both wind and tide stay for this gentleman;
And I, to blame, have held him here too long.—
—Good lord, you use this dalliance to excuse
Your breach of promise. Shaksp.

DA'LLIER, dâl'lė'ûr. n. s. [from dally.] A trifler; a fondler.

The daily dalliers with pleasant words, with smiling countenances, and with wagers purposed to be lost before they were purposed to be made.
Ascham.

DA'LLOP, dâl'lûp. n. s. [of unknown etymology.] A tuft, or clump: not in use.

Of barley the finest and greenest ye find,
Leave standing in dallops till time ye do bind.
Tusser.

To DA'LLY, dâl'lė. v. n. [dollen, Dut. to trifle.]

1. To trifle; to play the fool; to amuse one's self with idle play; to lose time in trifles; to procrastinate idly.

Take up thy master:
If thou shouldst dally half an hour, his life,
With thine, and all that offer to defend him,
Stand in assured loss. Shaksp. King Lear.

He left his cur, and laying hold
Upon his arms, with courage bold
Cried out, 'tis now no time to dally,
The enemy begin to rally. Hudibras.

We have trifled too long already: it is madness to dally any longer, when our souls are at stake.
Calamy.

One hundred thousand pounds must be raised; for there is no dallying with hunger. Swift.

2. To exchange caresses; to play the wanton; to fondle.

He is not lolling on a lewd love bed,
But on his knees at meditation;
Not dallying with a brace of courtezans,
But meditating with two deep divines. Shaksp.

3. To sport; to play; to frolick.

She her airie buildeth in the cedar's top,
And dallies with the wind, and scorns the sun.
Shakspeare.

4. To delay.

They that would not be reformed by that correction, wherein he dallied with them, shall feel a judgment worthy of God. Wisdom, xii. 26.

To DA'LLY, dâl'lė. v. a. To put off; to delay; to amuse till a proper opportunity.

He set down to perform service, not by the hazard of one set battle, but by dallying off the time with often skirmishes. Knolles's History.

DAM, dâm. n. s. [from dame, which formerly signified mother, Had Nero never been an emperour, shulde never his dame have been slaine. Chaucer.]

1. The mother: used of beasts, or other animals not human.

The dam runs lowing up and down,
Looking the way her harmless young one went,
And can do nought but wail her darling loss. Shaksp.

Mother, says a sick kite, let me have your prayers.—Alas, my child, says the dam, which of the Gods shall I go to? L'Estrange.

Birds bring but one morsel of meat at a time, and have not fewer, it may be, than seven or eight young in their nest together, which, at the return of their dams, do all at once, with equal greediness, hold up their heads and gape. Ray.

2. A human mother, in contempt or detestation.

This brat is none of mine;
It is the issue of Polixena:
Hence with it, and, together with the dam.
Commit them to the fire. Shaksp. Winter's Tale.

DAM, dâm. n. s. [dam, Dut.] A mole or bank to confine water.

As when the sea breaks o'er its bounds,
And overflows the level grounds,
Those banks and dams, that like a skreen
Did keep it out, now keep it in. Hudibras.

Not with so fierce a rage the foaming flood
Roars, when he finds his rapid course withstood;
Bears down the dams with unresisted sway,
And sweeps the cattle and the cots away. Dryd.

Let loose the reins to all your wat'ry store,
Bear down the dams, and open every door. Dryd.

The inside of the dam must be very smooth and streight; and if it is made very sloping on each side, it is the better. Mortimer's Husbandry.

To DAM, dâm. v. a. [bemman, popebemman, Sax. dammen, Dut.]

1. To confine, or shut up, water by moles or dams.

I'll have the current in this place damm'd up;
And here the smug and silver Trent shall run
In a new channel, fair and evenly. Shaksp.

Home I would go,
But that my doors are hateful to my eyes,
Fill'd and damm'd up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring.
Otway.

Boggy lands are fed by springs, pent by a weight of earth, that dams in the water, and causes it to spread. Mortimer.

'Tis you must drive that trouble from your soul;
As streams, when damm'd, forget their ancient current;
And, wond'ring at their banks, in other channels flow. Smith.

2. It is used by Shakspeare of fire, and by Milton of light.

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns.
Shaksp.

Moon! if your influence be quite damm'd up
With black usurping mists, some gentle taper,
Though a rush-candle from the wicker hole
Of some clay habitation, visit us
With thy long levell'd rule of streaming light.
Milton.

DA'MAGE, dâm'îdje.[90] n. s. [domage, Fr.]

1. Mischief; hurt; detriment.

Gross errours and absurdities many commit for want of a friend to tell them of them, to the great damage both of their fame and fortune. Bacon.

Such as were sent from thence did commonly do more hurt and damage to the English subjects than to the Irish enemies, by their continual cess and extortion. Davies.

He repulsed the enemy very much to their damage. Clarendon.

2. Loss; mischief suffered.

His heart exalts him in the harm
Already done, to have dispeopled heav'n,
My damage fondly deem'd. Milton

3. The value of mischief done.

They believed that they were not able, though they should be willing to sell all they have in Ireland, to pay the damages which had been sustained by the war. Clarendon.

4. Reparation of damage; retribution.

The bishop demanded restitution of the spoils taken by the Scots, or damages for the same. Bacon.

Tell me whether, upon exhibiting the several particulars which I have related to you, I may not sue her for damages in a court of justice?
Addison.

5. [In law.] Any hurt or hindrance that a man taketh in his estate. In the common law it particularly signifies a part of what the jurors be to enquire of; for, after verdict given of the principal cause, they are likewise asked their consciences touching costs, which are the charges of suit, and damages, which contain the hindrance which the plaintiff or demandant hath suffered, by means of the wrong done him by the defendant or tenant. Cowell.

When the judge had awarded due damages to a person into whose field a neighbour's oxen had broke, it is reported that he reversed his own sentence, when he heard that the oxen which had done this mischief, were his own. Watts.

To DA'MAGE, dâm'îdje.[90] v. a. [from the noun.] To mischief; to injure; to impair; to hurt; to harm.

I consider time as an immense ocean, into which many noble authors are entirely swallowed up, many very much shattered and damaged, some quite disjointed and broken into pieces. Addison.

To DA'MAGE, dâm'îdje. v. n. To take damage, or be damaged.

DA'MAGEABLE, dâm'îdje-â-bl. adj. [from damage.]

1. Susceptible of hurt: as, damageable goods.

2. Mischievous; pernicious.

Obscene and immodest talk is offensive to the purity of God, damageable and infectious to the innocence of our neighbours, and most pernicious to ourselves. Government of the Tongue.

DA'MASCENE, dâm'zn. n. s. [damascenus, from Damascus.] A small plum; a damson, as it is now spoken.

In April follow the cherry tree in blossom, the damascene and plum trees in blossom, and the white thorn in leaf. Bacon.

In fruits the white commonly is meaner, as in pear plums and damascenes; and the choicest plums are black. Bacon.

DA'MASK, dâm'ûsk.[88] n. s. [damasquin, Fr. damaschino, Ital. from Damascus.]

1. Linen or silk woven in a manner invented at Damascus, by which part, by a various direction of the threads, exhibits flowers or other forms.

Not any weaver which his work doth boast
In diaper, damask, or in lyne. Spenser.

Wipe your shoes, for want of a clout, with a damask napkin. Swift.

2. It is used for red colour in Fairfax, from the damask rose.

And for some deale perplexed was her spirit,
Her damask late, now chang'd to purest white.
Fairfax.

To DA'MASK, dâm'ûsk.[88] v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To form flowers upon stuffs.
2. To variegate; to diversify.

They sat recline
On the soft downy bank, damask'd with flowers.
Milton.

Around him dance the rosy hours,
And damasking the ground with flow'rs,
With ambient sweets perfume the morn. Fenton.

3. To adorn steel-work with figures; practised, I suppose, first at Damascus.

DAMASK-PLUM, dâm'ûsk-plûm. See PLUM.

DAMASK-ROSE, dâm'ûsk-rôze. n. s. The rose of Damascus; a red rose. See ROSE.

Damask-roses have not been known in England above one hundred years, and now are so common. Bacon.

No gradual bloom is wanting from the bud,
Nor broad carnations, nor gay spotted pinks,
Nor, shower'd from ev'ry bush, the damask-rose.
Thomson.

DA'MASKENING, dâm'ûsk-ên-ing. n. s. [from damasquiner, Fr.] The art or act of adorning iron or steel, by making incisions, and filling them up with gold or silver wire: used in enriching the blades of swords, and locks of pistols. Chambers.

DAME, dâme. n. s. [dame, Fr. dama, Span.]

1. A lady; the old title of honour to women.

The word dame originally signified a mistress of a family, who was a lady; and it is used still in the English law to signify a lady: but in common use, now-a-days, it represents a farmer's wife or a mistress of a family of the lower rank in the country. Watts's Logick.

Bless you, fair dame! I am not to you known,
Though in your state of honour I am perfect.
Shakspeare.

Not all these lords do vex me half so much
As that proud dame, the lord protector's wife. Shak.

Shut your mouth, dame! Shaksp. King Lear.

Sov'reign of creatures, universal dame! Milton.

2. It is still used in poetry for women of rank.

His father Faunus; a Laurentian dame
His mother, fair Marica was her name. Dryden.

Who would not repeat that bliss,
And frequent sight of such a dame
Buy with the hazard of his fame? Waller.

3. Mistress of a low family.

They killed the poor cock; for, say they, if it were not for his waking our dame, she would not wake us. L'Estrange.

4. Women in general.

We've willing dames enough; there cannot be
That vulture in you, to devour so many
As will to greatness dedicate themselves. Shak.

DAMES-VIOLET, dâmz-vî'ô-lêt. n. s. A plant, called also queen's gillyflower. Miller.

To DAMN, dâm.[411] v. a. [damno, Lat.]

1. To doom to eternal torments in a future state.

It is most necessary, that the church, by doctrine and decree, do damn and send to hell for ever those facts and opinions. Bacon.

2. To procure or cause to be eternally condemned.

That which he continues ignorant of, having done the utmost lying in his power that he might not be ignorant of it, shall not damn him. South.

3. To condemn.

His own impartial thought
Will damn, and conscience will record the fault.
Dryden.

4. To hoot or hiss any publick performance; to explode.

They damn themselves, nor will my muse descend
To clap with such who fools and knaves commend.
Dryden.

For the great dons of wit,
Phœbus gives them full privilege alone
To damn all others, and cry up their own. Dryd.

You are so good a critick, that it is the greatest happiness of the modern poets that you do not hear their works; and, next, that you are not so arrant a critick as to damn them, like the rest without hearing. Pope.

DA'MNABLE, dâm'nâ-bl. adj. [from damn.]

1. Deserving damnation; justly doomed to never-ending punishment.

It gives him occasion of labouring with greater earnestness elsewhere, to entangle unwary minds with the snares of his damnable opinion. Hooker.

He's a creature unprepar'd, unmeet for death;
And to transport him in the mind he is
Were damnable. Shaksp.

As he does not reckon every schism of a damnable nature, so he is far from closing with the new opinion of those who make it no crime. Swift.

2. It is sometimes indecently used in a low and ludicrous sense: odious; pernicious.

O thou damnable fellow! did not I pluck thee by the nose for thy speeches? Shaksp.

DA'MNABLY, dâm'nâ-blê. adv. [from damnable.]

1. In such a manner as to incur eternal punishment; so as to be excluded from mercy.

We will propose the question, whether those who hold the fundamentals of faith may deny Christ damnably, in respect of those consequences that arise from them? South's Sermons.

2. It is indecently used in a ludicrous sense; odiously; hatefully.

The more sweets they bestowed upon them, the more damnably their conserves stunk. Dennis.

DAMNA'TION, dâm-nâ'shûn. n. s. [from damn.] Exclusion from divine mercy; condemnation to eternal punishment.

He that hath been affrighted with the fears of hell, or remembers how often he has been spared from an horrible damnation, will not be ready to strangle his brother for a trifle. Taylor.

Now mince the sin,
And mollify damnation with a phrase;
Say you consented not to Sancho's death,
But barely not forbade it. Dryden.

DA'MNATORY, dâm'nâ-tûr-ê.[512] adj. [from damnatorius.] Containing a sentence of condemnation.

DA'MNED, dâ'mnd, or dâm'nêd.[362] part. adj. [from damn.] Hateful; detestable; abhorred; abominable.

Not in the legions
Of horrid hell can come a devil more damn'd
In evils to top Macbeth. Shaksp. Macbeth.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury and damned incest. Shakspeare.

But, oh! what damned minutes tells he o'er,
Who doats, yet doubts; suspects, yet strongly loves.
Shakspeare.

Dare not
To brand the spotless virtue of my prince,
With falsehoods of most base and damn'd contrivance. Rowe.

DAMNI'FIC, dâm-nîf'îk. adj. [from damnify.] Procuring loss; mischievous.

To DA'MNIFY, dâm'nê-fi. v. a. [from damnifico, Lat.]

1. To endamage; to injure; to cause loss to any.

He, who has suffered the damage, has a right to demand in his own name, and he alone can remit, satisfaction: the damnified person has the power of appropriating the goods or service of the offender, by right of self-preservation. Locke.

2. To hurt; to impair.

When now he saw himself so freshly rear,
As if late fight had nought him damnified,
He was dismay'd, and 'gan his fate to fear.
Fairy Queen.

DA'MNINGNESS, dâm'nîng-nês. n. s. [from damning.] Tendency to procure damnation.

He may vow never to return to those sins which he hath had such experience of, for the emptiness and damningness of them, and so think himself a complete penitent. Hammond.

DAMP, dâmp. adj. [dampe, Dutch.]

1. Moist; inclining to wet; not completely dry; foggy.

She said no more: the trembling Trojans hear,
O'erspread with a damp sweat and holy fear. Dryd.

2. Dejected; sunk; depressed.

All these and more came flocking, but with looks
Downcast and damp: yet such wherein appear'd
Obscure some glimpse of joy. Milton.

DAMP, dâmp. n. s.

1. Fog; moist air; moisture.

Night; not now, as ere man fell,
Wholesome and cool, and mild; but with black air
Accompanied, with damps and dreadful gloom.
Milton.

A rift there was, which from the mountain's height
Convey'd a glimmering and malignant light;
A breathing-place to draw the damps away,
A twilight of an intercepted day. Dryden.

2. A noxious vapour exhaled from the earth.

The heat of the sun, in the hotter seasons, penetrating the exterior parts of the earth, excites those mineral exhalations in subterraneous caverns, which are called damps: these seldom happen but in the summer-time; when, the hotter the weather is, the more frequent are the damps. Woodward.

3. Dejection; depression of spirit; cloud of the mind.

Adam, by this from the cold sudden damp
Recov'ring, and his scatter'd spirits return'd,
To Michael thus his humble words address'd. Milton.

His name struck every where so great a damp,
As Archimedes through the Roman camp. Rosc.

Ev'n now, while thus I stand blest in thy presence,
A secret damp of grief comes o'er my thoughts.
Addison.

An eternal state he knows and confesses that he has made no provision for, that he is undone for ever: a prospect enough to cast a damp over his sprightliest hours. Rogers.

This commendable resentment against me, strikes a damp upon that spirit in all ranks and corporations of men. Swift.

To DAMP, dâmp, v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To wet; to moisten; to make humid.
2. To depress; to deject; to chill; to dull.

The very loss of one pleasure is enough to damp the relish of another. L'Estrange.

Dread of death hangs over the mere natural man, and, like the hand-writing on the wall, damps all his jollity. Atterbury.

It would be enough to damp their warmth in such pursuits, if they could once reflect, that in such course they will be sure to run upon the very rock they mean to avoid. Swift.

3. To weaken; to abate; to hebetate; to discourage.

A soft body dampeth the sound much more than a hard. Bacon.

4. To hebetate; to abate motion; to discourage; to dull.

Usury dulls and damps all industries, improvements, and new inventions, wherein money would be stirring, if it were not for this slug. Bacon.

Unless an age too late, or cold
Climate, or years, damp my intended wing
Depress'd. Milton.

DA'MPISHNESS, dâmp'ish-nês. n. s. [from damp.] Tendency to wetness; fogginess; moisture.

It hath been used by some with great success to make their walls thick; and to put a lay of chalk between the bricks, to take away all dampishness. Bacon.

DA'MPNESS, dâmp'nês. n. s. [from damp.] Moisture; fogginess.

Nor need they fear the dampness of the sky
Should flag their wings, and hinder them to fly;
'Twas only water thrown on sails too dry. Dryden.

By stacks they often have very great loss by the dampness of the ground, which rots and spoils it. Mortimer.

DA'MPY, dâmp'ê. adj. [from damp.] Dejected; gloomy; sorrowful.

The lords did dispell dampy thoughts, which the remembrance of his uncle might raise, by applying him with exercises and disports. Hayward.

DA'MSEL, dâm'zêl.[102] n. s. [damoiselle, Fr.]

1. A young gentlewoman; a young woman of distinction: now only used in verse.

Kneeling, I my servant's smiles implore,
And one mad damsel dares dispute my power. Prior.

2. An attendant of the better rank.

With her train of damsels she was gone
In shady walks, the scorching heat to shun. Dryden.

3. A wench; a country lass.

The clowns are whoremasters, and the damsels with child. Gay.

DA'MSON, dâm'zn.[170] n. s. [corruptly from damascene.] A small black plum. See DAMASCENE.

My wife desir'd some damsons,
And made me climb with danger of my life. Shaksp.

DAN, dân. n. s. [from dominus, as now don in Span. and donna, Ital. from domina.] The old term of honour for men, as we now say Master. I know not that it was ever used in prose, and imagine it to have been rather of ludicrous import.

Dan Chaucer well of English undefiled. Douglas.

This whimpled, whining, purblind, wayward boy,
This signior Junio's giant dwarf, dan Cupid. Shaksp.

Dick, if this story pleaseth thee,
Pray thank dan Pope, who told it me. Prior.

To DANCE, dânse.[78 79] v. a. [danser, Fr dancar, Span. as some think from tanza, Arab. a dance; as Junius, who loves to derive from Greek, thinks, from δονησις.] To move in measure; to move with steps correspondent to the sound of instruments.

What say you to young Mr. Fenton? He capers, he dances, he has eyes of youth, he writes verses. Shakspeare.

To DANCE Attendance, dânse. v. n. To wait with suppleness and obsequiousness.

Men are sooner weary to dance attendance at the gates of foreign lords, than to tarry the good leisure of their own magistrates. Raleigh's Essays.

It upbraids you,
To let your father's friend, for three long months,
Thus dance attendance for a word of audience. Dryden.

To DANCE, dânse. v. a. To make to dance; to put into a lively motion.

Thy grandsire lov'd thee well;
Many a time he danc'd thee on his knee. Shaksp.

That I see thee here,
Thou noble thing! more dances my rapt' heart,
Than when I first my wedded mistress saw
Bestride my threshold. Shakspeare.

In pestilences, the malignity of the infecting vapour danceth the principal spirits. Bacon.

DANCE, dânse.[78 79] n. s. [from the verb.] A motion of one or many in concert, regulated by musick.

Our dance of custom, round about the oak of Herne the hunter. Shakspeare.

The honourablest part of talk is to give the occasion, and again to moderate and to pass to somewhat else; for then a man leads the dance. Bacon.

But you perhaps expect a modish feast,
With am'rous songs and wanton dances grac'd. Dryden.

DA'NCER, dân'sûr. n. s. [from dance.] One that practises the art of dancing.

He at Philippi kept
His sword e'en like a dancer, while I strook
The lean and wrinkled Cassius. Shakspeare.

Musicians and dancers! take some truce
With these your pleasing labours; for great use
As much weariness as perfection brings. Donne.

The earl was so far from being a good dancer, that he was no graceful goer. Wotton.

It is a usual practice for our funambulours, or dancers on the rope, to attempt somewhat like to flying. Wilkins.

He, perfect dancer! climbs the rope,
And balances your fear and hope. Prior.

Nature, I thought, perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art;
And, vex'd, I found that the musician's hand
Had o'er the dancer's mind too great command. Prior.

DA'NCINGMASTER, dân'sing-mâs-tûr. n. s. [dance and master.] One who teaches the art of dancing.

The apes were taught their apes tricks by a dancingmaster. L'Estrange.

The legs of a dancingmaster, and the fingers of a musician, fall, as it were, naturally, without thought or pains, into regular and admirable motions. Locke.

DA'NCINGSCHOOL, dân'sing-skôôl. n. s. [dancing and school.] The school where the art of dancing is taught.

They bid us to the English dancingschools,
And teach lavoltas high, and swift courantos;
Saying our grace is only in our heels. Shakspeare.

A certain Egyptian king endowed a dancingschool for the institution of apes of quality. L'Estrange.

DANDELI'ON, dân-dê-li'ûn. n. s. [dent de lion, Fr.] The name of a plant.

It agrees in all respects with the hawkweed, but only in its having a single naked stalk, with one flower upon the top. Miller.

For cowslips sweet, let dandelions spread;
For Blouzelinda, blithsome maid, is dead! Gay.

DA'NDIPRAT, dân'dê-prât. n. s. [dandin, Fr.] A little fellow; an urchin: a word used sometimes in fondness, sometimes in contempt.

To DA'NDLE, dân'dl.[405] v. a. [dandelen, Dutch.]

1. To shake a child on the knee, or in the hands, to please and quiet him.

Then shall ye suck, and shall be born upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees. Isaiah.

Thy little brethren, which, like fairy sprights,
Oft skip into our chamber those sweet nights,
And, kiss'd and dandled on thy father's knee,
Were brib'd next day to tell what they did see. Donne.

Courts are but superficial schools
To dandle fools. Bacon.

Sporting the lion ramp'd, and in his paw
Dandled the kid. Milton.

Motion occasions sleep, as we find by the common use of rocking froward children in cradles, or dandling them in their nurses arms. Temple.

2. To fondle; to treat like a child.

Their child shall be advanc'd
And be received for the emperor's heir;
And let the emperor dandle him for his own. Shaksp.

They have put me in a silk gown, and a gaudy fool's cap; I am ashamed to be dandled thus, and cannot look in the glass without blushing, to see myself turned into such a little pretty master. Addison.

3. To delay; to procrastinate; to protract by trifles: not in use.

Captains do so dandle their doings, and dally in the service, as if they would not have the enemy subdued. Spenser.

DA'NDLER, dând'lûr. n. s. [from dandle.] He that dandles or fondles children.

DA'NDRUFF, dân'drûf. n. s. [often written dendriff, from ταν, the itch, and δηορ, sordid, filthy.] Scabs in the head; scurf at the roots of the hair.

DA'NEWORT, dâne'wûrt. n. s. A species of elder; called also dwarf-elder, or wall-wort.

DA'NGER, dâne'jûr.[98] n. s. [danger, Fr. of uncertain derivation. Skinner derives it from damnum, Menage from angaria, Minshew from δάνος, death, to which Junius seems inclined.] Risk; hazard; peril.

They that sail on the sea, tell of the danger. Ecclus. xliii. 24.

Our craft is in danger to be set at naught. Acts, x. 27.

He hath writ this to feel my affection to your honour, and to no other pretence of danger. Shaksp.

More danger now from man alone we find,
Than from the rocks, the billows, and the wind. Waller.

To DA'NGER, dâne'jûr. v. a. [from the noun.] To put in hazard; to endanger.

Pompey's son stands up
For the main soldier; whose quality going on,
The sides o' th' world may danger. Shakspeare.

DA'NGERLESS, dâne'jûr-lês. adj. [from danger.] Without hazard; without risk; exempt from danger.

He shewed no less magnanimity in dangerless despising, than others in dangerous affecting, the multiplying of kingdoms. Sidney.

DA'NGEROUS, dâne'jûr-ûs.[543] adj. [from danger.] Hazardous; perilous; full of danger.

A man of an ill tongue is dangerous in his city. Ecclus. ix.

All men counsel me to take away thy life, likely to bring forth nothing but dangerous and wicked effects. Sidney.

Already we have conquer'd half the war,
And the less dangerous part is left behind. Dryden.

DA'NGEROUSLY, dâne'jûr-ûs-lê. adv. [from dangerous.] Hazardously; perilously; with danger.

But for your son, believe it, oh believe it,
Most dang'rously you have with him prevail'd,
If not most mortal to him. Shakspeare.

A sort of naughty persons

Have practis'd dangerously against your state,
Dealing with witches and with conjurors. Shaksp.

It is just with God to permit those, which think they stand so surely, to fall most dangerously. Hammond.

Plutarch says, Telesilla, a noble lady, being dangerously sick, was advised to apply her mind to poetry. Peacham.

If it were so, which but to think were pride,
My constant love would dangerously be tried. Dryd.

DA'NGEROUSNESS, dâne'jûr-ûs-nês. n. s. [from dangerous.] Danger; hazard; peril.

I shall not need to mind you of judging of the dangerousness of diseases, by the nobleness of the part affected. Boyle.

To DA'NGLE, dâng'gl.[405] v. n. [from hang, according to Skinner; as, hang, hangle, dangle.] To hang loose and quivering.

Go, bind thou up yon dangling apricocks. Shaksp.

He'd rather on a gibbet dangle,
Than miss his dear delight to wrangle. Hudibras.

Codrus had but one bed; so short, to boot,
That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out. Dryden.

With dangling hands he strokes th' imperial robe,
And with a cuckold's air commands the globe. Smith.

But have you not with thought beheld
The sword hang dangling o'er the shield? Prior.

2. To hang upon any one; to be an humble, useless, harmless follower.

The presbyterians, and other fanaticks that dangle after them, are well inclined to pull down the present establishment. Swift.

DA'NGLER, dâng'glûr. n. s. [from dangle.] A man that hangs about women only to waste time.

A dangler is of neither sex. Ralph.

DANK, dângk.[408] adj. [from tuncken, Germ. Skinner.] Damp; humid; moist; wet.

He her the maiden sleeping found
On the dank and dirty ground. Shakspeare.

Yet oft they quit
The dank, and rising on stiff pinions tour
The mid aereal sky. Milton.

Through each thicket, dank or dry,
Like a black mist, low creeping, he held on
His midnight search. Milton.

Now that the fields are dank, and ways are mire,
Where shall we sometimes meet, and by the fire
Help waste a sullen day? Milton.

By the rushy-fringed bank,
Where grows the willow and the osier dank,
My sliding chariot stays. Milton.

Me, in my vow'd
Picture, the sacred wall declares t' have hung
My dank and drooping weeds
To the stern god of sea. Milton.

To wash the skins of beasts and fowls herewith, would keep them from growing dank in moist weather. Grew.

DA'NKISH, dângk'ish. adj. Somewhat dank.

They bound me, bore me thence,
And in a dark and dankish vault at home
There left me. Shakspeare.

To DAP, dâp. v. n. [corrupted from dip.] To let fall gently into the water: a word, I believe, only used by anglers.

I have taught him how to catch a chub, by dapping with a grasshopper. Walton.

DAPA'TICAL, dâp-ât'ê-kâl. adj. [from dapaticus, Lat.] Sumptuous in cheer. Bailey.

DA'PPER, dâp'pûr.[98] adj. [dapper, Dut.] Little and active; lively without bulk. It is usually spoken in contempt.

And on the tawny sands and shelves,
Trip the pert fairies and the dapper elves. Milton.

A pert dapper spark of a magpye fancied the birds would never be governed till himself should sit at the helm. L'Estrange.

DA'PPERLING, dâp'pûr-ling. n. s. [from dapper.] A dwarf; a dandiprat. Ainsworth.

DA'PPLE, dâp'pl.[405] adj. [from apple; as pommelé.] Marked with various colours; variegated; streaked; imbricated: it is used chiefly of animals.

My country neighbours do not find it impossible to think of a lame horse, till they have run over all beings that are, and then pitch on dapple. Locke.

To DA'PPLE, dâp'pl. v. a. [from the adjective.] To streak; to vary; to diversify with colours.

But under him a grey steed did he wield,
Whose sides with dappled circles were endight. Spenser.

The gentle day
Dapples the drowsy east with spots of grey. Shaksp.

Horses that are dappled turn white; and old squirrels turn grisly. Bacon.

The lark begins his flight,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise. Milton.

The dappled pink, and blushing rose,
Deck my charming Chloe's hair. Prior.

The gods, to curse Pamela with her pray'rs,
Gave the gilt coach and dappled Flanders mares. Pope.

DAR,[78] dâr } n. s. A fish found in the Se-
DART, dârt. } vern. Bailey. Dart is the same with Dace.

To DARE, dâre. v. n. pret. I durst; the preterit I dared belongs to the active dare; part. I have dared. [ðeapnan, Sax. derren, Dut.] To have courage for any purpose; not to be afraid; to adventure; to be adventurous.

Darest thou be as good as thy word now?—
Why, Hal, thou knowest as thou art but a man,
I dare; but as thou art a prince, I fear thee. Shaksp.

I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more, is none. Shakspeare.

They are both hanged; and so would this be, if he durst steal any thing adventurously. Shakspeare.

Neither of them was of that temper as to dare any dangerous fact. Hayward.

The father bore it with undaunted soul,
Like one who durst his destiny controul. Dryden.

Deliberate and well-weighed courage knows both to be cautious and to dare, as occasion offers. Dryd.

We dare not build much upon such a notion or doctrine, till it be very fully examined. Watts.

To DARE, dâre. v. a pret. I dared, not I durst. To challenge; to defy.

I never in my life
Did hear a challenge urg'd more modestly,
Unless a brother should a brother dare
To gentle exercise and proof of arms. Shaksp.

Here she stands:
Take but possession of her with a touch;
I dare thee but to breathe upon my love. Shaksp.

He had many days come half seas over; and sometimes passing further, came and lay at the mouth of the harbour, daring them to fight. Knolles.

Masters of the arts of policy thought that they might even defy and dare Providence to the face. South.

All cold, but in her breast, I will despise;
And dare all heat but that in Celia's eyes. Roscommon.

Time! I dare thee to discover
Such a youth, and such a lover. Dryden.

Presumptuous wretch! with mortal art to dare
Immortal power, and brave the thunderer. Granville.

To DARE Larks, dâre lârks. To catch them by means of a looking-glass, or by keeping a bird of prey hovering aloft, which keeps them in amaze till caught; to amaze.

Shrimps are dipped up in shallow water with little round nets, not much unlike that which is used for daring larks. Carew.

As larks lie dar'd to shun the hobby's flight. Dryden.

DARE, dâre. n. s. [from the verb.] Defiance; challenge.

Sextus Pompeius
Hath given the dare to Cæsar, and commands
The empire of the sea. Shakspeare.

DARE, dâre. n. s. A small fish, the same with dace. Leuciscus.

DA'REFUL, dâre'fûl. adj. [dare and full.] Full of defiance: not in use.

We might have met them dareful, beard to beard,
And beat them backward home. Shaksp.

DA'RING, dâ'ring. adj. [from dare.] Bold; adventurous; fearless; courageous; intrepid; brave; stout.

The last Georgick has many metaphors, but not so daring as this; for human passions may be more naturally ascribed to a bee than to an inanimate plant. Addison.

The song too daring, and the theme too great. Prior.

Grieve not, O daring prince, that noble heart. Pope.

DA'RINGLY, dâ'ring-lê. adv. [from daring.] Boldly; courageously; fearlessly; impudently; outrageously.

Some of the great principles of religion are every day openly and daringly attacked from the press. Atterbury.

Your brother, fir'd with his success,
Too daringly upon the foe did press. Halifax.

DA'RINGNESS, dâ'ring-nês. n. s. [from daring.] Boldness.

DARK, dârk. adj. [ðeopc, Sax.]

1. Not light; wanting light.

Fleance, his son, who keeps him company,
Must embrace the fate of that dark hour. Shaksp.

While we converse with her, we mark
No want of day, nor think it dark. Waller.

2. Not of a showy or vivid colour.

If the plague be somewhat dark, and the plague spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean. Leviticus.

In Muscovy the generality of the people are more inclined to have dark coloured hair than flaxen. Boyle.

3. Blind; without the enjoyment of light.

Thou wretched daughter of a dark old man,
Conduct my weary steps. Dryden and Lee's Oedipus.

4. Opake; not transparent: as, lead is a dark body.

5. Obscure; not perspicuous.

What may seem dark at the first, will afterwards be found more plain. Hooker.

Mean time we shall express our darker purpose. Shakspeare.

6. Not enlightened by knowledge; ignorant.

The age, wherein he liv'd was dark; but he Could not want sight, who taught the world to see. Denham.

7. Gloomy; not cheerful.

All men of dark tempers, according to their degree of melancholy or enthusiasm, may find convents fitted to their humours. Addison on Italy.

DARK, dârk. n. s.

1. Darkness; obscurity; want of light.

Come thick night,
And pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell,
That my keen knife see not the wound it makes;
Nor heaven peep through the blanket of the dark,
To cry, hold! hold! Shaksp. Macbeth.

Cloud and ever-during dark
Surrounds me! from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off. Milton.

Whereas seeing requires light, and a free medium, and a right line to the objects, we can hear in the dark immur'd, and by curve lines. Holder.

2. Obscurity; condition of one unknown.

All he says of himself is, that he is an obscure person; one, I suppose he means, that is in the dark. Atterbury.

3. Want of knowledge.

Till we ourselves perceive by our own understandings, we are as much in the dark, and as void of knowledge, as before. Locke.

To DARK, dårk. v. a. [from the noun.] To darken; to obscure: obsolete.

Fair when that cloud of pride, which oft doth dark
Her goodly light, with smiles she drives away. Spenser.

To DA'RKEN, dår'kn.[405] v. a. [from dark.]

1. To make dark; to deprive of light.

Black with surrounding forests then it stood,
That hung above, and darken'd all the flood. Addis.

Whether the darken'd room to muse invite,
Or whiten'd wall provoke the skew'r to write. Pope.

2. To cloud; to perplex.

Such was his wisdom, that his confidence did seldom darken his foresight, especially in things near hand. Bacon.

3. To foul; to sully.

The lusts and passions of men do sully and darken their minds, even by natural influence. Tillotson.

To DA'RKEN, dår'kn. v. n. To grow dark.

DA'RKLING, dårk'ling. [a participle, as it seems, from darkle, which yet I have never found; or perhaps a kind of diminutive from dark, as young, youngling.] Being in the dark; being without light: a word merely poetical.

O, wilt thou darkling leave me? do not so. Shaks.

Darkling stands
The varying shore o' th' world. Shakspeare.

The wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and, in shadiest covert hid,
Tunes her nocturnal note. Milton.

Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's pow'r,
With words and wicked herbs, from human kind
Had alter'd, and in brutal shapes confin'd. Dryden.

DA'RKLY, dårk'lė. adv. [from dark.] In a situation void of light; obscurely; blindly; gloomily; uncertainly.

For well you know, and can record alone,
What fames to future times conveys but darkly down. Dryden.

DA'RKNESS, dårk'nės. n. s. [from dark.]

1. Absence of light.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep. Genesis.

I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death. Job.

2. Opakeness; want of transparency.

3. Obscurity; want of perspicuity; difficultness to the understanding.

4. Infernal gloom; wickedness.

The instruments of darkness tell us truths;
Win us with honest trifles, to betray us
In deepest consequence. Shaksp.

5. State of being intellectually clouded; ignorance; uncertainty.

All the light truth has, or can have, is from the clearness and validity of those proofs upon which it is received; to talk of any other light in the understanding, is to put ourselves in the dark, or in the power of the prince of darkness. Locke.

6. The empire of Satan, or the Devil.

Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son. Colossians

DA'RKSOME, dårk'sům. adj. [from dark.] Gloomy; obscure; not well enlightened; not luminous.

He brought him thro' a darksome narrow pass
To a broad gate. Spenser.

And her fair eyes, like stars that dimmed were
With darksome cloud, now shew their goodly beams. Spenser.

You must not look to have an image in any thing lightsome, for even a face in iron, red-hot, will not be seen, the light confounding the small differences of lightsome and darksome, which shew the figure. Bacon.

A darksome cloud of locusts, swarming down
Must eat, and on the ground leave nothing green. Milton.

He, here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay. Milton.

Mistaken blessing, which old age they call,
'Tis a long, nasty, darksome hospital. Dryden.

The darksome pines, that o'er yon rocks reclin'd,
Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind. Pope.

DA'RLING, dår'ling.[515] adj. [ꝺeoplinȝ, Sax. diminutive of dear.] Favourite; dear; beloved; regarded with great kindness and tenderness.

'Tis not for a generous prince to countenance oppression and injustice, even in his most darling favourites. L'Estrange.

Have a care lest some beloved notion, or some darling science, too far prevail over your mind. Watts.

DA'RLING, dår'ling. n. s. A favourite; one much beloved.

Young Ferdinand they suppose is drown'd,
And his and my lov'd darling. Shaksp.

In Thames, the ocean's darling, England's pride,
The pleasing emblem of his reign does glide. Halifax.

She became the darling of the princess. Addison.

To DARN, dårn. v. a. [of uncertain original.] To mend holes by imitating the texture of the stuff.

Will she thy linen wash, or hosen darn? Gay.

He spent every day ten hours in his closet, in darning his stockings, which he performed to admiration. Swift.

DA'RNEL, dår'nil.[99] n. s. [lolium.] A weed growing in the fields.

He was met ev'n now
Crown'd with rank fumiter and furrow weeds,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn. Shaksp.

Want ye corn for bread?
'Twas full of darnel; do you like the taste? Shaksp.

No fruitful crop the sickly fields return;
But oats and darnel choak the rising corn. Dryden.

To DA'RRAIN, dår-ıåne'. v. a. [This word is by Junius referred to dare: it seems to me more probably deducible from arranger la battaille.]

1. To prepare for battle; to range troops for battle.

The town-boys parted in twain, the one side calling themselves Pompeians, the other Cæsarians, and then darraining a kind of battle, but without arms, the Cæsarians got the over hand. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

Comes Warwick, backing of the duke of York;
Darrain your battle; for they are at hand. Shaksp.

2. To apply to the fight: of single combatants.

Therewith they 'gan to hurlen greedily,
Redoubted battle ready to darraine. Spenser.

DART, dårt. n. s. [dard, Fr.]

1. A missile weapon thrown by the hand; a small lance.

Here one is wounded or slain with a piece of a rock or flint; there another with a dart, arrow, or lance. Peacham.

O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar they fling,
The weapons round his hollow temples ring. Dryd.

2. [In poetry.] Any missile weapon.

To DART, dårt. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To throw offensively.

He whets his tusks, and turns, and dares the war;
Th' invaders dart their jav'lins from afar. Dryden.

2. To throw; to emit; as, the sun darts his beams on the earth.

Pan came, and ask'd what magick caus'd my smart;
Or what ill eyes malignant glances dart. Pope.

To DART, dårt. v. n.

1. To fly as a dart.

2. To let fly with hostile intention.

Now, darting Parthia, art thou struck. Shaksp.

To DASH, dåsh. v. a. [The etymology of this word, in any of its senses, is very doubtful.]

1. To throw or strike any thing suddenly against something.

If you dash a stone against a stone in the bottom of the water, it maketh a sound. Bacon.

A man that cuts himself, and tears his own flesh, and dashes his head against the stones, does not act so unreasonably as the wicked man. Tillotson.

2. To break by collision.

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them;
And if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces. Shaksp.

David's throne shall then be like a tree,
Spreading and overshad'wing all the earth;
Or as a stone, that shall to pieces dash
All monarchies besides throughout the world. Milton.

3. To throw water in flashes.

Dashing water on them may prove the best remedy. Mortimer.

Middling his head, and prone to earth his view,
With ears and chest that dash the morning dew. Tickel.

4. To bespatter; to besprinkle.

This tempest,
Dashing the garment of this peace, aboded
The sudden breach on't. Shaksp. Henry VIII.

5. To agitate any liquid, so as to make the surface fly off.

At once the brushing oars and brazen prow
Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depth below. Dryden.

6. To mingle; to adulterate; to change by some worse admixture.

Whacum, bred to dash and draw,
Not wine, but more unwholesome law. Hudibras.

I take care to dash the character with such particular circumstances, as may prevent ill-natured applications. Addison.

Several revealed truths are dashed and adulterated with a mixture of fables and human inventions. Spectator, No. 580.

7. To form or sketch in haste; carelessly.

Never was dash'd out, at one unlucky hit,
A fool so just a copy of a wit. Pope.

8. To obliterate; to blot; to cross out.

To dash over this with a line, will deface the whole copy extremely, and to a degree that, I fear, may displease you. Pope.

9. To confound; to make ashamed suddenly; to surprise with shame or fear; to depress; to suppress.

His tongue
Dropp'd manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash
Maturest councils. Milton.

Yearly enjoin'd, some say, to undergo
This annual, humbling certain number'd days,
To dash their pride and joy for man seduc'd. Milt.

An unknown hand still check'd my forward joy,
Dash'd me with blushes. Dryden and Lee's Oedipus.

To dash this cavil, read but the practice of Christian emperors. South.

After they had sufficiently blasted him in his personal capacity, they found it an easy work to dash and overthrow him in his political. South.

Nothing dashed the confidence of the mule like the braying of the ass, while he was dilating upon his genealogy. L'Estrange.

The nymph, when nothing could Narcissus move,
Still dash'd with blushes for her slighted love. Addison.

Some stronger pow'r eludes our sickly will;
Dashes our rising hope with certain ill. Prior.

Dash the proud gamester in his gilded car;
Bare the mean heart that lurks beneath a star. Pope.

To DASH, dâsh. v. n.

1. To fly off the surface by a violent motion.

If the vessel be suddenly stopt in its motion, the liquor continues its motion, and dashes over the sides of the vessel. Cheyne.

2. To fly in flashes with a loud noise.

On each hand the gushing waters play,
And down the rough cascade, all dashing, fall. Thomson.

3. To rush through water, so as to make it fly.

Doeg, tho' without knowing how or why,
Spurr'd boldly on, and dash'd thro' thick and thin,
Thro' sense and nonsense, never out or in. Dryden.

DASH, dâsh. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Collision.

By the touch ethereal rous'd,
The dash of clouds, or irritating war
Of fighting winds, while all is calm below,
They furious spring. Thomson.

2. Infusion; something worse mingled in a small proportion.

There is nothing which one regards so much with an eye of mirth and pity, as innocence, when it has in it a dash of folly. Addison.

3. A mark in writing; a line ——, to note a pause or omission.

He is afraid of letters and characters, of notes and dashes, which, set together, do signify nothing. Brown's Vul. Err.

In modern wit, all printed trash is Set off with num'rous breaks and dashes. Swift.

4. Sudden stroke; blow; act: ludicrous.

Stand back, you lords, and give us leave awhile.
——She takes upon her bravely at first dash. Shak.

DASH, dâsh. adv. An expression of the sound of water dashed.

Hark, hark, the waters fall;
And with a murmuring sound,
Dash, dash, upon the ground,
To gentle slumbers call. Dryden.

DA'STARD, dâs'târd.[88] n. s. [adaɼtniʒa, Sax.] A coward; a poltron; a man infamous for fear.

The cruelty and envy of the people,
Permitted by our dastard nobles,
Have suffer'd me by th' voice of slaves to be Whoop'd out of Rome. Shakspeare.

Who now my matchless valour dare oppose?
How long will Dares wait his dastard foes? Dryden.

Dastard and drunkard, mean and insolent;
Tongue-valiant hero, vaunter of thy might,
In threats the foremost, but the last in fight. Dryd.

Bug-bear thoughts, in the minds of children, make them dastards, and afraid of the shadow of darkness ever after. Locke.

Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd! Addison.

To DA'STARD, dâs'târd. v. a. To terrify; to intimidate; to desert with cowardice; to dispirit.

I'm weary of this flesh which holds us here,
And dastards manly souls with hope and fear. Dryden.

To DA'STARDISE, dâs'târ-dize. v. a. [from dastard.] To intimidate: to deject with cowardice; to dispirit; to depress; to terrify; to make an habitual coward.

He had such things to urge against our marriage,
As, now declar'd, would blunt my sword in battle,
And dastardise my courage. Dryden.

DA'STARDLY, dâs'târd-lè. adj. [from dastard.] Cowardly; mean; timorous.

Brawl and clamour is so arrant a mark of a dastardly wretch, that he does as good as call himself so that uses it. L'Estrange.

DA'STARDY, dâs'târ-dè. n. s. [from dastard.] Cowardliness; timorousness.

DA'TARY, dâ'tûr-è. n. s. [datarius.] An officer of the chancery of Rome, through whose hands benefices pass. Dict.

DATE, dâte. n. s. [datte, Fr. from datum, Lat.]

1. The time at which a letter is written, marked at the end or the beginning.

2. The time at which any event happened.

3. The time stipulated when any thing shall be done.

His days and times are past,
And my reliance on his fracted dates
Has smit my credit. Shaksp. Timon.

My father's promise ties me not to time;
And bonds without a date, they say are void. Dryden.

4. End; conclusion.

What time would spare, from steel receives its date;
And monuments, like men, submit to fate. Pope.

5. Duration; continuance.

Could the declining of this fate, O friend,
Our date to immortality extend? Denham.

Then raise,
From the conflagrant mass, purg'd and refin'd,
New heav'ns, new earth, ages of endless date,
Founded in righteousness. Milton.

6. [from dactylus.] The fruit of the date-tree.

Hold, take these keys, and fetch more spices, nurse.
——They call for dates and quinces in the pastry. Shaksp.

DATE-TREE, dâte'trêè. n. s. See PALM, of which it is a species.

To DATE, dâte. v. a. [from the noun.] To note with the time at which any thing is written or done.

'Tis all one in respect of eternal duration yet behind, whether we begin the world so many millions of ages ago, or date from the late æra of about six thousand years. Bentley.

To all their dated backs he turns you round;
These Aldus printed, those Du Sueil has bound. Pope.

DA'TELESS, dâte'lès. adj. [from date.] Without any fixed term.

The fly-slow hours shall not determinate
The dateless limit of thy dear exile. Shaksp.

DATIVE, dâ'tîv.[157] adj. [dativus, Lat.]

1. [In grammar.] The epithet of the case that signifies the person to whom any thing is given.

2. [In law.] Those are termed dative executors, who are appointed such by the judge's decree; as administrators with us here in England. Ayliffe.

To DAUB, dâwb.[213] v. a. [dabben, Dut. dauber, Fr.]

1. To smear with something adhesive.

She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch. Exodus.

2. To paint coarsely.

Hasty daubing will but spoil the picture, and make it so unnatural as must want false light to set it off. Otway.

They snatched out of his hands a lame imperfect piece, rudely daubed over with too little reflection. Dryden.

If a picture is daubed with many bright and glaring colours, the vulgar admire it as an excellent piece. Watts.

3. To cover with something specious or gross, something that disguises what it lies upon.

So smooth he daub'd his vice with shew of virtue,
He liv'd from all attainder of suspect. Shaksp.

4. To lay on any thing gaudily or ostentatiously.

Since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegancy, than daubed with cost. Bacon.

Let him be daub'd with lace, live high, and whore;
Sometimes be lousy, but be never poor. Dryden.

5. To flatter grossly.

Let every one, therefore, attend the sentence of his conscience; for, he may be sure, it will not daub nor flatter. South.

To DAUB, dâwb.[213] v. n. To play the hypocrite: this sense is not in use.

I cannot daub it further;
And yet I must. Shaksp.

DA'UBER, dâw'bûr.[98] n. s. [from daub.]

1. One who daubs.

2. A coarse low painter.

What they called his picture, had been drawn at length by the daubers of almost all nations, and still unlike him. Dryden.

Parts of different species jumbled together, according to the mad imagination of the dauber, to cause laughter. Dryden.

A sign-post dauber would disdain to paint
The one-eyed hero on his elephant. Dryden.

The treacherous tapster, Thomas,
Hangs a new angel two doors from us,
As fine as daubers' hands can make it. Swift.

3. A low flatterer.

DA'UBRY, dâw'brè. n. s. [from daub.] An old word for any thing artful.

She works by charms, by spells, and such daubry as this is beyond our element. Shaksp.

DA'UBY, dâw'bè. adj. [from daub.] Viscous; glutinous; adhesive.

Not in vain th' industrious kind
With dauby wax and flow'rs the chinks have lin'd. Dryden.

Some the gall'd ropes with dauby marling bind,
Or sear-cloth masts with strong tarpawling coats. Dryden.

DA'UGHTER, dâw'tûr.[218] n. s. [dauhtar, Goth. ɒohtep, Sax. dotter, Runick; dohter, Germ. dochter, Dut.]

1. The female offspring of a man or woman.

Your wives, your daughters,
Your matrons, and your maids, could not fill up
The cistern of my lust. Shaksp.

Now Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
With rosy lustre purpled o'er the lawn. Pope.

2. A daughter in law, or son's wife.

4. A woman.
Jacob went out to see the daughters of the land. Genesis.
1. [In poetry.] Any descendant.
5. The female penitent of a confessor.
Are you at leisure, holy father, now;
Or shall I come to you at evening mass?
—My leisure serves me, pensive daughter, now. Shaksp.

To DAUNT, dânt.[214] v. a. [domter, Fr. domitare, Lat.] To discourage; to fright; to intimidate.
Fairfax, whose name in arms thro' Europe rings,
And fills all mouths with envy or with praise,
And all her jealous monarchs with amaze,
And rumours loud, which daunt remotest kings. Milton.
Where the rude ax, with heaved stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallow'd haunt. Milton.
Some presences daunt and discourage us, when others raise us to a brisk assurance. Glanville.

DA'UNTLESS, dânt'lês. adj. [from daunt.] Fearless; not dejected; not discouraged.
Grow great by your example, and put on
The dauntless spirit of resolution. Shaksp.
Dauntless he rose, and to the fight return'd:
With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd. Dryden's Virgil.
He, not by wants or woes oppress'd
Stems the bold torrent with a dauntless breast. Dryden.
The utmost weight of affliction from ministerial power and popular hatred, were almost worth bearing, for the glory of such a dauntless conduct as he has shewn under it. Pope.

DA'UNTLESSNESS, dânt'lês-nês. n. s. [from dauntless.] Fearlessness.

DAW, dâw. n. s. [supposed by Skinner so named from his note; by Junius to be corrupted from dawl; the German tul, and dol in the Bavarian dialect, having the same signification.] The name of a bird. Menedulu.
I will wear my heart upon my sleeve,
For daws to peck it. Shaksp. Othello.
If death do quench us quite, we have great wrong,
That daws, and trees, and rocks should last so long,
When we must in an instant pass to nought. Davies.
The loud daw, his throat displaying, draws
The whole assembly of his fellow daws. Waller.

DAWK, dâwk. n. s. A cant word among the workmen for a hollow, rupture, or incision, in their stuff.
Observe if any hollow or dawks be in the length. Moxon.

To DAWK, dâwk. v. a. To mark with an incision.
Should they apply that side of the tool the edge lies on, the swift coming about of the work would, where a small irregularity of stuff should happen, jobb the edge into the stuff, and so dawk it. Moxon.

To DAWN, dâwn, v. n. [supposed by the etymologists to have been originally to dayen, or advance towards day.]
1. To grow luminous; to begin to grow light.
I have been troubled in my sleep this night;
But dawning day new comfort hath inspir'd. Shaksp.
As it began to dawn, towards the first day of the week, came Mary Magdelene to see the sepulchre. Matthew.
All night I slept, oblivious of my pain;
Aurora dawn'd and Phœbus shin'd in vain. Pope.
3. To glimmer obscurely.
A Romanist, from the very first dawning of any notions in his understanding, hath this principle constantly inculcated, that he must believe as the church. Locke.
3. To begin, yet faintly; to give some promises of lustre or eminence.
While we behold such dauntless worth appear
In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear. Dryden.
Thy hand strikes out some free design,
When life awakes and dawns at every line. Pope.

DAWN, dâwn. n. s. [from the verb.]
1. The time between the first appearance of light and the sun's rise, reckoned from the time that the sun comes within eighteen degrees of the horizon.
Then on to-morrow's dawn your care employ
To search the land, but give this day to joy. Dryden.
2. Beginning; first rise.
These tender circumstances diffuse a dawn of serenity over the soul. Pope.
Such their guiltless passion was,
As in the dawn of time inform'd the heart
Of innocence and undissembling truth. Thomson.

DAY, dâ.[220] n. s. [dæg, Sax.]
1. The time between the rising and setting of the sun, called the artificial day.
Why stand ye here all the day idle? Matthew.
Of night impatient, we demand the day;
The day arrives, then for the night we pray:
The night and day successive come and go,
Our lasting pains no interruption know. Blackmore.
Or object new
Casual discourse draws on, which intermits
Our day's work. Milton.
2. The time from noon to noon, or from midnight to midnight, called the natural day.
How many hours bring about the day,
How many days will finish up the year. Shaksp.
3. Light; sunshine.
Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness. Romans.
The west yet glimmers with some streaks of day:
Now spurs the lated traveller apace,
To gain the timely inn. Shaksp.
Around the fields did nimble lightnings play,
Which offer'd us by fits, and snatch'd the day:
'Midst this was heard the shrill and tender cry
Of well pleased ghosts, which in the storm did fly. Dryden.
Yet are we able only to survey
Dawnings of beams, and promises of day. Prior.
4. Any time specified and distinguished from other time; an age; the time. In this sense it is generally plural.
After him reigned Gutheline his heir,
The justest man and truest in his days. Fairy Q.
I think, in these days, one honest man is obliged to acquaint another who are his friends. Pope.
We have, at this time of day better and more certain means of information than they had. Woodward.
5. Life: in this sense it is commonly plural. He never in his days broke his word; that is, in his whole life.
He was never at a loss in his days for a frequent answer. Carte's Life of Ormonde.
6. The day of contest; the contest; the battle.
His name struck fear, his conduct won the day;
He came, he saw, he seiz'd the struggling prey. Roscommon.
The noble thanes do bravely in the war;
The day almost itself professes yours,
And little is to do. Shaksp. Macbeth.
Would you th' advantage of the fight delay,
If, striking first, you were to win the day? Dryden.
7. An appointed or fixed time.
Or if my debtors do not keep their day,
Deny their hands, and then refuse to pay,
I must with patience all the terms attend. Dryden.

As men for daybreak watch the eastern skies. Dryden.

DAYLA'BOUR, dâ-lâ'bûr. n. s. [day and labour.] Labour by the day; labour divided into daily tasks.
Doth God exact daylabour, light denied,
I fondly ask? Milton.
Daylabour was but an hard and a dry kind of livelihood to a man that could get an estate with two or three strokes of his pen. South.

DAYLA'BOURER, dâ-lâ'bûr-ûr. n. s. [from daylabour.] One that works by the day.
In one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath thresh'd the corn
That ten daylabourers could not end. Milton.
The daylabourer in a country village, has commonly but a small pittance of courage. Locke.

DA'YLIGHT, dâ'lîte. n. s. [day and light.] The light of the day, as opposed to that of the moon, or a taper.
By this the drooping daylight 'gan to fade,
And yield his room to sad succeeding night. F. Q.
Thou shalt buy this dear,
If ever I thy face by daylight see.
Now go thy way. Shaksp.
They, by daylight passing through the Turks fleet, recovered the haven, to the joy of the besieged Christians. Knolles.
He stands in daylight, and disdains to hide
An act, to which by honour he is tied. Dryden.
Will you murder a man in plain daylight? Dryd.
Though rough bears in covert seek defence,
White foxes stay, with seeming innocence;
That crafty kind with daylight can dispense. Dryden.
If bodies be illuminated by the ordinary prismatick colours, they will appear neither of their own daylight colours, nor of the colour of the light cast on them, but of some middle colour between both. Newton's Opticks.

So all ere dayspring, under conscious night,
Secret they finish'd, and in order set. Milton.

The breath of heav'n fresh-blowing, pure and sweet,
With dayspring born, here leave me to respire. Milton.

DA'YSTAR, dà'stâr. n. s. [day and star.] The morning star.

I meant to make her fair, and free, and wise,
Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great:
I meant the daystar should not brighter rise,
Nor lend like influence from his lucent seat. Ben Jonson.

Sunk though he be beneath the watry floor;
So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon uprears his drooping head. Milton.

DA'YTIME, dà'time. n. s. [day and time.] The time in which there is light: opposed to night.

In the daytime Fame sitteth in a watch-tower, and flieth most by night; she mingleth things done with things not done, and is a terror to great cities. Bacon.

My ants never brought out their corn but in the night when the moon did shine, and kept it under ground in the daytime. Addison.

DA'YWORK, dà'wûrk. n. s. [day and work.] Work imposed by the day; day-labour.

True labour in the vineyard of thy lord,
Ere prime thou hast th' imposed daywork done. Fairfax.

They smote the glistering armies, as they stand,
With quivering beams, which daz'd the wond'ring eye. Fairfax.

Poor human kind, all daz'd in open day,
Err after bliss, and blindly miss their way. Dryd.

DA'ZIED, dà'zîd.[282] adj. [rather dasied. See DAISY.] Besprinkled with daisies.

Let us
Find out the prettiest dazied plot we can,
And make him a grave. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

To DA'ZZLE, dâz'zl.[405] v. a. [See DAZE.]

1. To overpower with light; to hinder the action of the sight by sudden lustre.

Fears use to be represented in such an imaginary fashion, as they rather dazzle men's eyes than open them. Bacon.

How is it that some wits are interrupted,
That now they dazzled are, now clearly see? Davies.

2. To strike or surprise with splendour.

Those heavenly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly with their blaze
Insufferably bright. Milton.

The places that have either shining sentiments or manners, have no occasion for them: a dazzling expression rather damages them, and serves only to eclipse their beauty. Pope.

Ah, friend! to dazzle let the vain design;
To raise the thought, or touch the heart, be thine. Pope.

To DA'ZZLE, dâz'zl. v. n. To be overpowered with light; to lose the power of sight.

Dazzle mine eyes? or do I see three suns? Shaksp.

Come, boy, and go with me; thy sight is young,
And you shall read when mine begins to dazzle. Shaksp.

An overlight maketh the eyes dazzle, insomuch as perpetual looking against the sun would cause blindness. Bacon.

I dare not trust these eyes;
They dance in mists, and dazzle with surprize. Dryden.

DE'ACON, dê'kn.[170] [227] n. s. [diaconus, Lat.]

All, all but truth, drops dead-born from the press,
Like the last gazette, or like the last address. Pope.

4. Imitating death; senseless; motionless.

At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep. Psalms.

Anointing of the forehead, neck, feet, and backbone, we know is used for procuring dead sleeps. Bacon.

5. Unactive; motionless.

The tin sold sometimes higher, and sometimes lower, according to the quick vent and abundance, or the dead sale and scarcity. Carew.

Nay, there's a time when ev'n the rolling year
Seems to stand still: dead calms are in the ocean,
When not a breath disturbs the drousy main. Lee.

They cannot bear the dead weight of unemployed time lying upon their hands, nor the uneasiness it is to do nothing at all. Locke.

6. Empty; vacant.

This colour often carries the mind away; yea, it deceiveth the sense; and it seemeth to the eye a shorter distance of way, if it be all dead and continued, than if it have trees or buildings, or any other marks whereby the eye may divide it. Bacon.

Nought but a blank remains, a dead void space,
A step of life, that promis'd such a race. Dryden.

7. Useless; unprofitable.

The commodities of the kingdom they took, though they lay dead upon their hands for want of vent. Bacon.

Persuade a prince that he is irresistible, and he will take care not to let so glorious an attribute lie dead and useless by him. Addison.

8. Dull; gloomy; unemployed.

Travelling over Amanus, then covered with deep snow, they came in the dead winter to Aleppo. Knolles.

There is something unspeakably chearful in a spot of ground which is covered with trees, that smiles amidst all the rigours of winter, and gives us a view of the most gay season in the midst of that which is the most dead and melancholy. Addison.

9. Still; obscure.

Their flight was only deferred until they might cover their disorders by the dead darkness of the night. Hayward.

10. Having no resemblance of life.

At a second sitting, though I alter not the draught, I must touch the same features over again, and change the dead colouring of the whole. Dryden.

11. Obtuse; dull; not sprightly; used of sounds.

We took a bell of about two inches in diameter at the bottom, which was supported in the midst of the cavity of the receiver by a bent stick, in which when it was closed up, the bell seemed to sound more dead than it did when just before it sounded in the open air. Boyle.

12. Dull; frigid; not animated; not affecting.

How cold and dead does a prayer appear, that is composed in the most elegant forms of speech, when it is not heightened by solemnity of phrase from the sacred writings. Addison.

13. Tasteless; vapid; spiritless: used of liquors.

14. Uninhabited.

17. [In theology.] The state of spiritual death, lying under the power of sin.

You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins. Ephes. ii. 1.

The DEAD, dêd.[234] n. s. Dead men.

Jove saw from high, with just disdain,
The dead inspir'd with vital life again. Dryden.

The ancient Romans generally buried their dead near the great roads. Addison.

That the dead shall rise and live again, is beyond the discovery of reason, and is purely a matter of faith. Locke.

The tow'ring bard had sung, in nobler lays,
How the last trumpet wakes the lazy dead. Smith.

DEAD, dêd.[234] n. s. Time in which there is remarkable stillness or gloom; as at midwinter and midnight.

After this life, to hope for the favours of mercy then, is to expect an harvest in the dead of winter. South.

In the dead of the night, when the men and their dogs were all fast asleep. L'Estrange.

At length, in dead of night, the ghost appears
Of her unhappy lord. Dryden.

To DEAD, dêd.[234] v. n. [from the noun.] To lose force, of whatever kind.

Iron, as soon as it is out of the fire, deadeth straitways. Bacon's Nat. Hist

To DEAD, dêd, } v. a.
To DE'ADEN, dêd'dn.[405] }

1. To deprive of any kind of force or sensation.

That the sound may be extinguished or deaded by discharging the pent air, before it cometh to the mouth of the piece, and to the open air, is not probable. Bacon.

It is requisite that the tympanum be tense, and hard stretched, otherwise the laxness of that membrane will certainly dead and damp the sound. Holder.

This motion would be quickly deadened by countermotions. Glanville's Scepsis Scientifica.

We will not oppose any thing to them that is hard and stubborn, but by a soft answer deaden their force by degrees. Burnet's Theory

Our dreams are great instances of that activity which is natural to the human soul, and which is not in the power of sleep to deaden or abate. Spectator.

Anodynes are such things as relax the tension of the affected nervous fibres, or destroy the particular acrimony which occasions the pain; or what deadens the sensation of the brain by procuring sleep. Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. To make vapid, or spiritless.

The beer and the wine, as well within water as above, have not been palled or deaded at all. Bacon.

DEAD-DOING, dĕd'dō-ĭng. participial adj. [dead and do.] Destructive; killing; mischievous; having the power to make dead.

Hold, O dear lord, your dead-doing hand,
Then loud he cried, I am your humble thrall. Spenser.

They never care how many others
They kill, without regard of mothers,
Or wives or children, so they can
Make up some fierce dead-doing man. Hudibras.

DEAD-LIFT, dĕd-lĭft'. n. s. [dead and lift.] Hopeless exigence.

And have no power at all, nor shift,
To help itself at a dead-lift. Hudibras.

DE'ADLY, dĕd'lē. adj. [from dead.]

1. Destructive; mortal; murderous.

She then on Romeo calls—As if that name,
Shot from the deadly level of a gun,
Did murther her. Shaksp.

Dry mourning will decay more deadly bring,
As a north wind burns a too forward spring;
Give sorrow vent, and let the sluices go. Dryden.

2. Mortal; implacable.

The Numidians, in number infinite, are deadly enemies unto the Turks. Knolles.

DE'ADLY, dĕd'lē. adv.

1. In a manner resembling the dead.

Like dumb statues, or unbreathing stones,
Star'd each on other, and look'd deadly pale. Shak.

Young Arcite heard, and up he ran with haste,
And ask'd him why he look'd so deadly want?
Dryden.

2. Mortally.

I will break Pharaoh's arms, and he shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man. Ez. xxx. 24.

3. Implacably; irreconcileably; destructively.

4. It is sometimes used in a ludicrous sense, only to enforce the signification of a word.

Mettled schoolboys, set to cuff,
Will not confess that they have done enough,
Though deadly weary. Orrery.

John had got an impression, that Lewis was so deadly cunning a man, that he was afraid to venture himself alone with him. Arbuthnot.

DE'ADNESS, dĕd'nĕs. n. s. [from dead.]

1. Frigidity; want of warmth; want of ardour; want of affection.

His grace removes the defect of inclination, by taking off our natural deadness and disaffection towards them. Rogers.

2. Weakness of the vital powers; languor; faintness; inactivity of the spirits.

Your gloomy eyes betray a deadness,
And inward languishing. Dryden and Lee's Oedipus.

3. Vapidness of liquors; loss of spirits.

Deadness or flatness in cyder is often occasioned by the too free admission of air into the vessels. Mortimer.

DEAD-RECKONING, dĕd rĕk-nĭng. n. s. [a sea term.] That estimation or conjecture which the seamen make of the place where a ship is, by keeping an account of her way by the log, by knowing the course they have steered by the compass, and by rectifying all with allowance for drift or lee-way; so that this reckoning is without any observation of the sun, moon and stars, and is to be rectified as often as any good observation can be had.

DEAF, dĕf.[234] adj. [doof, Dut.]

1. Wanting the sense of hearing.

Come on my right hand, for this ear is deaf. Shaksp.

Infected minds,
To their deaf pillows will discharge their secrets. Shaksp.

The chief design here intended is to instruct such as are deaf and dumb, and dumb only by consequence of their want of hearing. Holder.

If any sins afflict our life
With that prime ill, a talking wife,
Till death shall bring the kind relief,
We must be patient, or be deaf. Prior.

Thus you may still be young to me,
While I can better hear than see:
Oh ne'er may fortune shew her spite,
To make me deaf, and mend my sight. Swift.

2. It has to before the thing that ought to be heard.

I will be deaf to pleading and excuses;
Nor tears nor prayers shall purchase out abuses. Shaksp.

Oh, that men's ears should be
To counsel deaf, but not to flattery! Shaksp.

Whilst virtue courts them; but, alas, in vain!
Fly from her kind embracing arms,
Deaf to her fondest call, blind to her greatest charms. Roscommon.

Not so, for once indulg'd, they sweep the main;
Deaf to the call, or, hearing, hear in vain. Dryd.

Hope, too long with vain delusion fed,
Deaf to the rumour of fallacious fame,
Gives to the roll of death his glorious name. Pope.

3. Deprived of the power of hearing.

Deaf with the noise, I took my hasty flight:
No mortal courage can support the fright. Dryd.

4. Obscurely heard.

Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease;
Confus'd and chiding like the hollow roar
Of tides receding from th' insulted shore. Dryden.

The rest were seiz'd with sullen discontent,
And a deaf murmur through the squadrons went. Dryden.

To DEAF, dĕf.[234] v. a. To deprive of the power of hearing.

Hearing hath deaf'd our sailors; and if they Know how to hear, there's none know what to say. Donne.

A swarm of their aerial shapes appears,
And, flutt'ring round his temples, deafs his ears. Dryden.

To DE'AFEN, dĕf'fn.[405] v. a. [from deaf.] To deprive of the power of hearing.

But Salius enters; and, exclaiming loud
For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd. Dryd.

From shouting men, and horns, and dogs, he flies,
Deafen'd and stunn'd with their promiscuous cries. Addison.

DE'AFLY, dĕf'lē. adv. [from deaf.]

1. Without sense of sounds.

2. Obscurely to the ear.

DE'AFNESS, dĕf'nĕs. n. s. [from deaf.]

1. Want of the power of hearing; want of sense of sounds.

Those who are deaf and dumb, are dumb by consequence from their deafness. Holder.

The Dunciad had never been writ, but at his request, and for his deafness; for had he been able to converse with me, do you think I had amused my time so ill? Pope.

2. Unwillingness to hear.

I found such a deafness, that no declaration from the bishops could take place. King Charles.

DEAL, dēle[227] n. s. [deel, Dut.]

1. Part.

A great deal of that which had been, was now to be removed out of the church. Hooker.

2. Quantity; degree of more or less. It was formerly joined with different words, to limit its meaning; as, some deal, in some degree, to some amount: we now either say, a great deal, or a deal without an adjective; but this is commonly, if not always, ludicrous or contemptuous.

When men's affections do frame their opinions, they are in defence of errour more earnest, a great deal, than, for the most part, sound believers in the maintenance of truth, apprehending according to the nature of that evidence which scripture yieldeth. Hooker.

There is, indeed, store of matters, fitter and better a great deal for teachers to spend time and labour in Hooker.

To weep with them that weep, doth ease some deal;
But sorrow flouted at is double death. Shaksp.

What a deal of cold business doth a man mispend the better part of life in! In scattering compliments, and tendering visits. Ben Jonson.

The charge some deal thee haply honour may,
That noble Dudone had while here he lived. Fairfax.

Possibly some never so much as doubted of the safety of their spiritual estate; and, if so, they have so much the more reason, a great deal to doubt of it. South.

The author, who knew that such a design as this could not be carried on without a great deal of artifice and sophistry, has puzzled and perplexed his cause. Addison.

3. [From the verb to deal.] The art or practice of dealing cards.

How can the muse her aid impart,
Unskill'd in all the terms of art?
Or in harmonious numbers put
The deal, the shuffle, and the cut? Swift.

4. [deyl, Dut.] Fir-wood, or the wood of pines.

I have also found, that a piece of deal, far thicker than one would easily imagine, being purposely interposed betwixt my eye, placed in a room, and the clearer daylight, was not only somewhat transparent, but appeared quite through a lovely red. Boyle on Colours.

To DEAL, dēle.[227] v. a. [deelen, Dut.]

1. To distribute; to dispose to different persons.

Deal thy bread to the hungry, and bring the poor that are cast out to thy house. Isaiah lviii. 7.

One with a broken truncheon deals his blows. Dryden.

His lifted arms around his head he throws,
And deals in whistling air his empty blows. Dryd.

The business of mankind, in this life, being rather to act than to know, their portion of knowledge is dealt them accordingly. Addison.

How Spain prepares her banners to unfold,
And Rome deals out her blessings and her gold. Tickel.

Had the great men of antiquity been possessed of the art of printing, they would have made an advantage of it, in dealing out their lectures to the public. Addison.

If you deal out great quantities of strong liquor to the mob, there will be many drunk. Watts.

2. To scatter; to throw about.

Keep me from the vengeance of thy darts,
Which Niobe's devoted issue felt,
When hissing through the skies the feather'd deaths were dealt. Dryden.

3. To give gradually, or one after another.
The nightly mallet deals resounding blows. Gay.

4. To distribute the cards.

To DEAL, dêle. v. n.

1. To traffick; to transact business; to trade.
It is generally better to deal by speech than by letter; and by a man himself, than by the mediation of a third. Bacon.
This is to drive a wholesale trade, when all other petty merchants deal but for parcels.
Decay of Piety.
They buy and sell, they deal and traffick. South.
With the fond maids in palmistry he deals,
They tell the secret which he first reveals. Prior.

2. To act between two persons; to intervene.
Sometimes he that deals between man and man, raiseth his own credit with both, by pretending greater interest than he hath in either. Bacon.

3. To behave well or ill in any transaction.
I doubt not, if he will deal clearly and impartially, but that he will acknowledge all this to be true. Tillotson.

4. To act in any manner.
Two deep enemies,
Foes to my rest, and my sweet sleep's disturbers,
Are they that I would have thee deal upon. Shak.

5. To deal by. To treat well or ill. This seems a vitious use.
Such an one deals not fairly by his own mind, nor conducts his own understanding aright. Locke.

6. To deal in. To have to do with; to be engaged in; to practise.
Suiters are so distasted with delays and abuses, that plain-dealing, in denying to deal in suits at first, is grown not only honourable, but also gracious. Bacon.
The Scripture forbids even the countenancing a poor man in his cause; which is a popular way of preventing justice, that some men have dealt in, though without that success which they proposed to themselves. Atterbury.
Among authors, none draw upon themselves more displeasure than those who deal in political matters. Addison.
True logick is not that noisy thing that deals all in dispute, to which the former ages had debased it. Watts's Logick.

7. To deal with. To treat in any manner; to use well or ill.
Neither can the Irish, nor yet the English lords, think themselves wronged, nor hardly dealt with, to have that which is none of their own given to them. Spenser's Ireland.
Who then shall guide
His people? Who defend? Will they not deal
Worse with his followers, than with him they dealt?
Milton.
If a man would have his conscience deal clearly with him, he must deal severely with that.
South's Sermons.
God did not only exercise this providence towards his own people, but he dealt thus also with other nations. Tillotson.
But I will deal the more civilly with his two poems, because nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead. Dryden.
You wrote to me with the freedom of a friend, dealing plainly with me in the matter of my own trifles. Pope.
Reflect on the merits of the cause, as well as of the men, who have been thus dealt with by their country. Swift.

8. To deal with. To contend with.
If she hated me, I should know what passion to deal with. Sidney.
Gentlemen were commanded to remain in the country, to govern the people, easy to be dealt with whilst they stand in fear. Hayward.
Then you upbraid me; I am pleas'd to see
You're not so perfect, but can fail like me:
I have no God to deal with. Dryden.

To DEA'LBATE, dê-âl'bâte. v. a. [dealbo, Lat.] To whiten; to bleach.

DEALBA'TION, dê-âl-bâ'shûn. n. s. [dealbatio, Lat.] The act of bleaching or whitening; rendering things white which were not so before: a word in little use.
All seed is white in viviparous animals, and such as have preparing vessels, wherein it receives a manifold dealbation. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

DE'ALER, dê'lûr.[98] n. s. [from deal.]

1. One that has to do with any thing.
I find it common with these small dealers in wit and learning, to give themselves a title from their first adventure. Swift.

DEAN, dêne.[227] n. s. [decanus, Lat. doyen, Fr.]
From the Greek word δεκα; in English, ten; because he was anciently set over ten canons or prebendaries at least in some cathedral church. Ayliffe's Parergon.
As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in England, the old and the new (the new are those which Henry VIII. upon suppression of abbeys transformed from abbot or prior, and convent, to dean and chapter) so there are two means of creating these deans; for those of the old foundations are brought to their dignity much like bishops, the king first sending out his congé d'elire to the chapter, the chapter then chusing and the bishop confirming them, and giving his mandate to instal them. Those of the new foundation are, by a shorter course, installed by virtue of the king's letters patent, without either election or confirmation.
This word is also applied to divers, that are chief of certain peculiar churches or chapels; as the dean of the king's chapel, the dean of the Arches, the dean of St. George's chapel at Windsor, and the dean of Bocking in Essex. Cowell.
The dean and canons, or prebends, of cathedral churches, were of great use in the church; they were not only to be of counsel with the bishop for his revenue, but chiefly for government in causes ecclesiastical. Use your best means to prefer such to those places who are fit for that purpose. Bacon.

DE'ANERY, dê'nûr-rê.[98] n. s. [from dean.]

1. The office of a dean.
He could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel-royal. Clarendon.

5. The image of mortality represented by a skeleton.

I had rather be married to a death's head, with a bone in his mouth, than to either of these. Shaksp.

If I gaze now, 'tis but to see
What manner of death's head 'twill be,
When it is free
From that fresh upper skin,
The gazer's joy, and sin. Suckling.

6. Murder; the act of destroying life unlawfully.

As in manifesting the sweet influence of his mercy, on the severe stroke of his justice: so in this, not to suffer a man of death to live. Bacon.

7. Cause of death.

DEBONA'IR, dėb-ò-nāre'. adj. [debonnaire, French.] Elegant; civil; well-bred; gentle; complaisant. Obsolete.

Crying, let be that lady debonair,
Thou recreant knight, and soon thyself prepare
To battle, if thou mean her love to gain. Spenser.

Zephyr met her once a maying;
Fill'd her with thee, a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonair. Milton.

The nature of the one is debonair and accostable; of the other, retired and supercilious; the one quick and sprightful, the other slow and saturnine. Howel's Vocal Forest.

And she that was not only passing fair,
But was withal discreet and debonair,
Resolv'd the passive doctrine to fulfil. Dryden.

DEBONA'IRLY, dėb-ò-nāre'lė. adv. [from debonair.] Elegantly; with a genteel air.

DEBT, dėt.[347] n. s. [debitum, Latin; dette, Fr.]

I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise. Romans.

2. One that owes money.

I'll bring your latter hazard back again,
And thankfully rest debtor for the first. Shaksp.

If he his ample palm
Should haply on ill-fated shoulder lay
Of debtor, straight his body to the touch
Obsequious, as whilom knights were wont,
To some enchanted castle is conveyed. Philips.

There died my father, no man's debtor:
And there I'll die, nor worse, nor better. Pope.

The case of debtors in Rome, for the first four centuries, was, after the set time for payment, no choice but either to pay, or be the creditor's slave. Swift.

3. One side of an account book.

When I look upon the debtor side, I find such innumerable articles, that I want arithmetick to cast them up; but when I look upon the creditor's side, I find little more than blank paper. Addison.

Those thousand decencies, that daily flow
From all her words and actions. Milton.

In good works there may be goodness in the general: but decence and gracefulness can be only in the particulars in doing the good. Sprat.

Were the offices of religion stript of all the external decencies of worship, they would not make a due impression on the minds of those who assist at them. Atterbury.

She speaks, behaves, and acts just as she ought;
But never, never reach'd one gen'rous thought:
Virtue she finds too painful an endeavour,
Content to dwell in decencies for ever. Pope.

2. Suitableness to character; propriety.

And must I own, she said, my secret smart,
What with more decence were in silence kept.
Dryden.

The consideration immediately subsequent to the being of a thing, is what agrees or disagrees with that thing; what is suitable or unsuitable to it; and from this springs the notion of decency or indecency, that which becomes or misbecomes. South.

Sentiments which raise laughter, can very seldom be admitted with any decency into an heroick poem. Addison.

3. Modesty; not ribaldry; not obscenity.

Immodest words admit of no defence;
For want of decency is want of sense. Pope.

To DECK, dêk. v. a. [decken, Dutch.]

1. To cover; to overspread.

Ye mists and exhalations, that now rise
From hill or steaming lake, dusky or grey,
In honour to the world's great Author, rise!
Whether to deck with clouds th' uncolour'd sky,
Or wet the thirsty earth with falling showers,
Rising or falling, still advance his praise. Milton.

2. To dress; to array.

Sweet ornament! that decks a thing divine. Shak.

Long may'st thou live to wail thy children's loss,
And see another, as I see thee now,
Deck'd in thy rights, as thou art stall'd in mine.
Shakspeare.

She sets to work millions of spinning worms,
That in their green shops weave the smooth-hair'd silk,
To deck her sons. Milton.

3. To adorn; to embellish.

But direful, deadly black, both leaf and bloom,
Fit to adorn the dead, and deck the dreary tomb.
Spenser.

Now the dew with spangles deck'd the ground,
A sweeter spot of earth was never found. Dryden.

The god shall to his vot'ries tell
Each conscious tear, each blushing grace,
That deck'd dear Eloisa's face. Prior.

DECK, dêk. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The floor of a ship.

Her keel plows hell,
And deck knocks heaven. Ben Jonson.

We have also raised our second decks, and given more vent thereby to our ordnance, trying on our nether overloop. Raleigh.

If any, born and bred under deck, had no other information but what sense affords, he would be of opinion that the ship was as stable as a house. Glanville.

On high rais'd decks the haughty Belgians ride,
Beneath whose shade our humble frigates go. Dryd.

At sun-set to their ship they make return,
And snore secure on decks till rosy morn. Dryden.

2. Pack of cards piled regularly on each other.

Besides gems, many other sorts of stones are regularly figured: the amianthus, of parallel threads, as in the pile of velvet; and the selenites, of parallel plates, as in a deck of cards. Grew.

DE'CKER, dêk'kûr. n. s. [from deck.] A dresser; one that apparels or adorns; a coverer, as a table-decker.

To nothing temporal. Shakspeare.

This tenth part, or tithe, being thus assigned unto him, leaveth now to be of the nature of the other nine parts, which are given us for our worldly necessities, and becometh as a thing dedicate and appropriate unto God. Spelman.

DEDICA'TION, dêd-ê-kâ'shûn. n. s. [dedicatio, Lat.]

1. The act of dedicating to any being or purpose; consecration; solemn appropriation.

It cannot be laid to many men's charge, that they have been so curious as to trouble bishops with placing the first stone in the churches; or so scrupulous as, after the erection of them, to make any great ado for their dedication. Hooker.

Among publick solemnities their is none so glorious as that under the reign of King Solomon, at the dedication of the temple. Addison.

2. An address to a patron.

Proud as Apollo on his forked hill,

Sat full-blown Bufo, puff'd by ev'ry quill;
Fed by soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand in hand in song. Pope.

DEDICA'TOR, dĕd'ė-kā-tŭr.[521] n. s. [from dedicate.] One who inscribes his work to a patron with compliment and servility.

Leave dang'rous truths to unsuccessful satires,
And flattery to fulsome dedicators. Pope.

DE'DICATORY, dĕd'ė-kā-tŭr-ė.[503] adj. [from dedicate.] Composing a dedication; complimental; adulatory.

Thus I should begin my epistle, if it were a dedicatory one; but it is a friendly letter. Pope.

DEDI'TION, dė-dĭsh'ŭn. n. s. [deditio, Lat.] The act of yielding up any thing; surrendry.

It was not a complete conquest, but rather a dedition upon terms and capitulations agreed between the conqueror and the conquered. Hale.

To DEDU'CE, dė-dūse'. v. a. [deduco, Latin.]

1. To draw in a regular connected series, from one time or one event to another.

I will deduce him from his cradle, through the deep and lubric waves of state and court, till he was swallowed in the gulf of fatality. Wolton Buck.

O goddess, say, shall I deduce my rhymes
From the dire nation in its early times? Pope.

2. To form a regular chain of consequential propositions.

Reason is nothing but the faculty of deducing unknown truths from principles already known. Locke.

3. To lay down in regular order, so as that the following shall naturally rise from the foregoing.

Lend me your song, ye nightingales! oh pour
The mazy-running soul of melody
Into my varied verse! while I deduce,
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of spring. Thomson.

DEDU'CEMENT, dė-dūse'mĕnt. n. s. [from deduce.] The thing deduced; the collection of reason; consequential proposition.

Praise and prayer are his due worship, and the rest of those deducements which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation. Dryden.

DEDU'CIBLE, dė-dū'sė-bl. adj. [from deduce.] Collectible by reason; consequential; discoverable from principles laid down.

The condition although deducible from many grounds, yet shall we evidence it but from few. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

The general character of the new earth is paradisaical; and the particular character, that it hath no sea: and both are apparently deducible from its formation. Burnet.

So far, therefore, as conscience reports any thing agreeable to or deducible from these, it is to be hearkened to. South.

All properties of a triangle depend on, and are deducible from, the complex idea of three lines, including a space. Locke.

DEDU'CIVE, dė-dū'sĭv. adj. [from deduce.] Performing the act of deduction. Dict.

To DEDU'CT, dė-dŭkt'. v. a. [deduco, Latin.]

We deduct from the computation of our years that part of our time which is spent in incogitancy of infancy. Norris.

2. To separate; to dispart; to divide. Now not in use.

Having yet, in his deducted spright,
Some sparks remaining of that heavenly fire. Spenser.

DEDU'CTION, dė-dŭk'shŭn. n. s. [deductio, Lat.]

1. Consequential collection; consequence; proposition drawn from principles premised.

Out of scripture such duties may be deduced, by some kind of consequence; as by long circuit of deduction, it may be that even all truth, out of any truth may be concluded. Hooker.

Set before you the moral law of God, with such deductions from it as our Saviour hath drawn, or our own reason, well informed, can make. Duppa.

That by diversity of motions we should spell out things not resembled by them, we must attribute to some secret deduction; but what this deduction should be, or by what mediums this knowledge is advanced, is as dark as ignorance. Glanville.

You have laid the experiments together in such a way, and made such deductions from them, as I have not hitherto met with. Boyle.

All cross and distasteful humours are either expressly or by clear consequence and deduction, forbidden in the New Testament. Tillotson.

A reflection so obvious, that natural instinct seems to have suggested it even to those who never much attended to deductions of reason. Rogers.

2. That which is deducted; defalcation.

Bring then these blessings to a strict account;
Make fair deductions; see to what they mount. Pope.

DEDU'CTIVE, dė-dŭk'tĭv. adj. [from deduct.] Deducible; that is or may be deduced from a position premised.

All knowledge of causes is deductive; for we know none by simple intuition, but through the mediation of their effects. Glanville.

DEDU'CTIVELY, dė-dŭk'tĭv-lė. adv. [from deductive.] Consequentially; by regular deduction; by a regular train of ratiocination.

There is scarce a popular errour passant in our days, which is not either directly expressed, or deductively contained, in this work. Brown.

DEED, dėėd. n. s. [dæd, Sax, daed, Dutch.]

1. Action, whether good or bad; thing done.

From lowest place when virtuous things proceed,
The place is dignified by th' doer's deed. Shaksp.

The monster nought replied: for words were vain,
And deeds could only deeds unjust maintain. Dryden.

The same had not consented to the council and deed. Luke.

We are not secluded from the expectation of reward for our charitable deeds. Smalridge.

2. Exploit; performance.

I, on the other side,
Us'd no ambition to commend my deeds;
The deeds themselves, tho' mute, spoke loud the doer. Milton.

Thousands were there, in darker fame that dwell,
Whose deeds some nobler poem shall adorn. Dryd.

3. Power of action; agency.

Nor knew I not
To be with will and deed created free. Milton.

4. Act declaratory of an opinion.

They desire, with strange absurdity, that to the same senate it should belong to give full judgment in matter of excommunication, and to absolve whom it pleased them, clean contrary to their own former deeds and oaths. Hooker.

5. Written evidence of any legal act.

The solicitor gave an evidence for a deed, which was impeached to be fraudulent. Bacon.

He builds his house upon the sand, and writes the deeds by which he holds his estate upon the face of a river. South.

6. Fact; reality; the contrary to fiction: whence the word indeed.

O that, as oft I have at Athens seen
The stage arise, and the big clouds descend;
So now in very deed I might behold
The pond'rous earth, and all yon marble roof,
Meet like the hands of Jove. Lee's Oedipus.

DEE'DLESS, dėėd'lės. adj. [from deed.] Unactive; without action; without exploits.

Speaking in deeds, and deedless in his tongue. Shakspeare.

Instant, he cried, your female discord end,
Ye deedless boasters! and the song attend. Pope.

To DEEM, dėėm. v. n. part. dempt, or deemed. [domgan, Gothick; doeman, Dut. deman, Sax.]

1. To judge; to conclude upon consideration; to think; to opine; to determine.

Here eke that famous golden apple grew,
For which th' Idean ladies disagreed,
Till partial Paris dempt it Venus' due. Spenser.

So natural is the union of religion with justice, that we may boldly deem there is neither, where both are not. Hooker.

He who, to be deem'd
A god, leap'd fondly into Ætna flames. Milton.

These blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd;
For never can I deem him less than god. Dryden.

Nature disturb'd,
Is deem'd vindictive to have chang'd her course. Thomson.

2. To estimate; to make estimate of: this sense is now disused.

Do me not to dy,
Ne deem thy force by fortune's doom unjust,
That hath, maugre her spite, thus low me laid in dust. Spenser.

But they that skill not of so heavenly matter,
All that they know not, envy, or admire,
Rather than envy, let them wonder at her,
But not to deem of her desert aspire. Spenser.

DEEM, dėėm. n. s. [from the verb.] Judgment; surmise; opinion. Not now in use.

Hear me, my love, be thou but true of heart,
—I true! how now? what wicked deem is this? Shakspeare.

DEE'MSTER, dėėm'stŭr. n. s. [from deem.] A judge: a word yet in use in Jersey and the Isle of Man.

DEEP, dėėp. adj. [deep, Saxon.]

The commissioners deferred the matter unto the earl of Northumberland, who was the principal man of authority in those parts. Bacon.

DE'FERENCE, dèf'êr-ênse.[503] n s. [deference, Fr.]

1. Regard; respect.

Virgil could have excelled Varius in tragedy and Horace in lyric poetry, but out of deference to his friends he attempted neither. Dryden.

He may be convinced that he is in an errour, by observing those persons, for whose wisdom and goodness he has the greatest deference, to be of a contrary sentiment. Swift.

2. Complaisance; condescension.

A natural roughness makes a man uncomplaisant to others; so that he has no deference for their inclinations, tempers, or conditions. Locke.

3. Submission.

Most of our fellow subjects are guided either by the prejudice of education, or by a deference to the judgment of those who, perhaps, in their own hearts, disapprove the opinions which they industriously spread among the multitude. Addison.

DE'FERENT, dèf'êr-ênt. adj. [from deferens, of defero, Lat.] That carries up and down.

The figures of pipes or concaves, through which sounds pass, or of other bodies deferent, conduce to the variety and alteration of the sound. Bacon.

DE'FERENT, dèf'êr-ênt. n. s. [from the adjective.] That which carries; that which conveys.

It is certain, however it crosses the received opinion, that sounds may be created without air, though air be the most favourable deferent of sounds. Bacon.

DE'FERENTS, dĕf'ĕr-ĕnts. n. s. [In surgery.] Certain vessels in the human body, appointed for the conveyance of humours from one place to another. Chambers.

DEFI'ANCE, dĕ-fī'ânse. n. s. [from deffi, Fr.]

1. A challenge; an invitation to fight.
   The fiery Tybalt, with his sword prepar'd,
   Which, as he breath'd defiance to my ears,
   He swung about his head. Shaksp.
   Nor is it just to bring
   A war, without a just defiance made. Dryden.
2. A challenge to make any impeachment good.
3. Expression of abhorrence or contempt.
   The Novatian heresy was very apt to attract well-meaning souls, who, seeing it bade such express defiance to apostacy, could not suspect that it was itself any defection from the faith. Decay of Piety.
   Nobody will so openly bid defiance to common sense, as to affirm visible and direct contradictions. Locke.

DEFI'CIENCE, dĕ-fĭsh'ĕnse. } n. s.
DEFI'CIENCY, dĕ-fĭsh'ĕn-sĕ. } [from deficio, Latin.]

1. Want; something less than is necessary.
   What is to be considered in this case, is chiefly, if there be a sufficient fulness or deficiency of blood, for different methods are to be taken. Arbuthnot.
   There is no burthen laid upon our posterity, nor any deficiency to be hereafter made up by ourselves, which has been our case in so many other subsidies. Addison.
2. Defect; failing; imperfection.
   Scaliger, finding a defect in the reason of Aristotle, introduceth one of no less deficiency himself. Brown's Vulgar Errours.
   Thou in thyself art perfect, and in thee
   Is no deficience found. Milton.
   We find, in our own natures, too great evidence of intellectual deficience, and deplorable confessions of human ignorance. Glanville.
   What great deficience is it, if we come short of others? Sprat.
   The characters of comedy and tragedy are never to be made perfect, but always to be drawn with some specks of frailty and deficience, such as they have been described to us in history. Dryden.

DEFI'CIENT, dĕ-fĭsh'ĕnt. adj. [deficiens, from deficio, Latin.] Failing; wanting; defective; imperfect.
   O woman! best of all things, as the will
   Of God ordain'd them: his creating hand
   Nothing imperfect or deficient left. Milton.
   Figures are either simple or mixed: the simple be either circular or angular; and of circular, either complete, as circles, or deficient, as ovals. Wotton.
   Neither Virgil nor Homer were deficient in any of the former beauties. Dryden.
   Several thoughts of the mind, for which we have either none, or very deficient names, are diligently to be studied. Locke.

DEFI'CIENT Numbers, dĕ-fĭsh'ĕnt. [in arithmetick] are those numbers, whose parts, added together, make less than the integer, whose parts they are. Chambers.

DEFI'ER, dĕ-fī'ûr. n. s. [from deffi, Fr.] A challenger; a contemner; one that dares and defies.
   Is it not then high time that the laws should provide, by the most prudent and effectual means, to curb those bold and insolent defiers of Heaven? Tillotson.

To DEFI'LE, dĕ-file'. v. a. [apilan, Saxon; from ful, foul.]

1. To make foul or impure; to make nasty or filthy; to dirty.
   There is a thing, Harry, known to many in our land by the name of pitch; this pitch, as ancient writers do report, doth defile. Shaksp.
   He is justly reckoned among the greatest prelates of this age, however his character may be defiled by mean and dirty hands. Swift.
2. To pollute; to make legally or ritually impure.
   That which dieth of itself he shall not eat, to defile himself therewith. Leviticus.
   Neither shall he defile himself for his father. Leviticus.
3. To corrupt chastity; to violate.
   Ev'ry object his offence revil'd;
   The husband murder'd, and the wife defil'd. Prior.
4. To taint; to corrupt; to vitiate; to make guilty.
   Forgetfulness of good turns, defiling of souls, adultery, and shameless uncleanness. Wisd.
   God requires rather that we should die, than defile ourselves with impieties. Stillingfleet.
   Let not any instances of sin defile your requests. Wake.

To DEFI'LE, dĕ-file'. v. n. [deffiler, Fr.] To march; to go off file by file.

DEFI'LE, dĕ-file'. n. s. [deffile, Fr. from file, a line of soldiers, which is derived from filum, a thread.] A narrow passage; a long narrow pass; a lane.
   There is in Oxford a narrow defile, to use the military term, where the partisans used to encounter. Addison.

DEFI'LEMENT, dĕ-file'mĕnt. n. s. [from defile.] The state of being defiled; the act of defiling; nastiness; pollution; corruption; defedation.
   Lust,
   By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
   Lets in defilement to the inward parts. Milton.
   The unchaste are provoked to see their vice exposed, and the chaste cannot rake into such filth without danger of defilement. Spectator.

DEFI'LER, dĕ-fī'lûr. n. s. [from defile.] One that defiles; a corrupter; a violator.
   At the last tremendous day, I shall hold forth in my arms my much wronged child, and call aloud for vengeance on her defiler. Addison.

DEFI'NABLE, dĕ-fīne'â-bl. adj. [from define.]

1. That may be defined; capable of definition.
   The Supreme Nature we cannot otherwise define, than by saying it is infinite; as if infinite were definable, or infinity a subject for our narrow understanding. Dryden.
2. That may be ascertained.
   Concerning the time of the end of the world, the question is, whether that time be definable or no. Burnet's Theory.

To DEFI'NE, dĕ-fīne'. v. a. [definio, Lat. definer, French.]

1. To give the definition; to explain a thing by its qualities and circumstances.
   Whose loss can'st thou mean,
   Thou dost so well their miseries define? Sidney.
   Though defining be thought the proper way to make known the proper signification, yet there are some words that will not be defined. Locke.
2. To circumscribe; to mark the limit; to bound.
   When the rings appeared only black and white, they were very distinct and well defined, and the blackness seemed as intense as that of the central spot. Newton.

To DEFI'NE, dĕ-fīne'. v. n. To determine; to decide; to decree.
   The unjust judge is the capital remover of landmarks, when he defineth amiss of lands and properties. Bacon.

DEFI'NER, dĕ-fī'nûr. n. s. [from define.] One that explains; one that describes a thing by its qualities.
   Your God, forsooth, is found
   Incomprehensible and infinite;
   But is he therefore found? Vain searcher! no:
   Let your imperfect definition show,
   That nothing you, the weak definer, know. Prior.

DE'FINITE, dĕf'ĕ-nît.[503 154] adj. [from definitus, Lat.]

1. Certain; limited; bounded.
   Hither to your arbour divers times he repaired, and here, by your means, had the sight of the goddess, who in a definite compass can set forth infinite beauty. Sidney.
2. Exact; precise.
   Idiots, in this case of favour, would
   Be wisely definite. Shaksp.
   In a charge of adultery, the accuser ought to set forth, in the accusatory libel, or inquisition, which succeeds in the place of accusation, some certain and definite time. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DE'FINITE, dĕf'ĕ-nît.[156] n. s. [from the adjective.] Thing explained or defined.
   Special bastardy is nothing else but the definition of the general; and the general, again, is nothing else but a definite of the special. Ayliffe.

DE'FINITENESS, dĕf'ĕ-nît-nĕs. n. s. [from definite.] Certainty; limitedness. Dict.

DEFINI'TION, dĕf'ĕ-nĭsh-ûn. n. s. [definitio, Lat. definition, French.]

1. A short description of a thing by its properties.
   I drew my definition of poetical wit from my particular consideration of him; for propriety of thoughts and words is only to be found in him. Dryden.
2. Decision; determination.
3. [In logick.] The explication of the essence of a thing by its kind and difference.
   What is man? Not a reasonable animal merely; for that is not an adequate and distinguishing definition. Bentley.

DEFI'NITIVE, dĕ-fĭn'ĕ-tĭv. adj. [definitivus, Lat.] Determinate; positive; express.
   Other authors write often dubiously; even in matters wherein is expected a strict and definitive truth. Brown's Vulgar Errours.
   I make haste to the casting and comparting of the whole work, it being indeed the very definitive sum of this art, to distribute usefully and gracefully a well chosen plot. Wotton.

DEFI'NITIVELY, dĕ-fĭn'ĕ-tĭv-lĕ. adv. [from definitive.] Positively; decisively; expressly.
   Definitively thus I answer you:
   Your love deserves my thanks; but my desert,
   Unmeritable, shuns your high request. Shaksp.
   Bellarmine saith, because we think that the body of Christ may be in many places at once, locally and visibly; therefore we say and hold, that the same body may be circumscriptively and definitively in more places at once. Hall.
   That Methuselah was the longest lived of all the children of Adam, we need not grant; nor is it definitively set down by Moses. Brown.

DEFI'NITIVENESS, dĕ-fĭn'ĕ-tĭv-nĕs. n. s. [from definitive.] Decisiveness.

DEFLAGRABI'LITY, dĕf-flâ-grâ-bĭl'ĕ-tĕ. n. s. [from deflagro, Lat.] Combustibility; the quality of taking fire, and burning totally away.

We have spent more time than the opinion of the ready deflagrability, if I may so speak, of salt-petre did permit us to imagine. Boyle.

DEFLA'GRABLE, dé-flá'grá-bl. adj. [from deflagro, Latin.] Having the quality of wasting away wholly in fire, without any remains.

Our chymical oils, supposing that they were exactly pure, yet they would be, as the best spirit of wine is, but the more inflammable and deflagrable. Boyle.

DEFLAGRA'TION, dêf-flá-grá'shŭn. n. s. [deflagratio, Lat.] A term frequently made use of in chymistry, for setting fire to several things in their preparation; as in making Æthiops with fire, with sal prunellæ, and many others. Quincy.

The true reason why paper is not burned by the flame that plays about it seems to be, that the aqueous part of the spirit of wine, being imbibed by the paper, keeps it so moist, that the flame of the sulphureous parts of the same spirit cannot fasten on it; and therefore when the deflagration is over, you shall always find the paper moist. Boyle.

To DEFLE'CT, dé-flékt'. v. n. [deflecto, Lat.] To turn aside; to deviate from a true course or right line.

At some parts of the Azores the needle deflecteth not, but lieth in the true meridian: on the other side of the Azores, and this side of the equator, the north point of the needle wheeleth to the west. Brown.

For, did not some from a straight course deflect,
They could not meet, they could no world erect.
Blackmore.

DEFLE'CTION, dé-flék'shŭn. n. s. [from deflecto, Lat.]

1. Deviation; the act of turning aside.

Needles incline to the south on the other side of the equator; and at the very line, or middle circle, stand without deflection. Brown.

2. A turning aside, or out of the way.

3. [In navigation.] The departure of a ship from its true course.

DEFLE'XURE, dé-flék'shŭre.[479] n. s. [from deflecto, Lat.] A bending down; a turning aside, or out of the way. Dict.

DEFLORA'TION, dêf-flŏ-rá'shŭn'.[530] n. s. [defloration, French; from defloratus, Lat.]

1. The act of deflouring; the taking away of a woman's virginity.

2. A selection of that which is most valuable.

The laws of Normandy are, in a great measure, the defloration of the English laws, and a transcript of them. Hale.

To DEFLO'UR, dé-flôûr'. v. a. [deflorer, Fr.]

1. To ravish; to take away a woman's virginity.

As is the lust of an eunuch to deflour a virgin, so is he that executeth judgment with violence. Ecclus.

Now will I hence to seek my lovely moor,
And let my spleenful sons this trull deflour. Shaksp.

2. To take away the beauty and grace of any thing.

How on a sudden lost,
Defac'd, d flour'd, and now to death devote! Milt.

If he died young, he died innocent, and before the sweetness of his soul was defloured and ravished from him by the flames and follies of a froward age. Taylor.

DEFLOU'RER, dé-flôû'rûr.[98] n. s. [from deflour.] A ravisher; one that takes away virginity.

I have often wondered, that those deflourers of innocence, though dead to all the sentiments of virtue and honour, are not restrained by humanity. Addison.

DEFLU'OUS, dêf'flû-ŭs. adj. [defluus, Lat.]

1. That flows down.

2. That falls off.

DEFLU'X, dé-flŭks'. n. s. [defluxus, Lat.] Downward flow.

Both bodies are clammy, and bridle the deflux of humours, without penning them in too much. Bacon.

DEFLU'XION, dé-flŭk'shŭn. n. s. [defluxio, Lat.] The flow of humours downward.

We see that taking cold moveth looseness, by contraction of the skin and outward parts; and so doth cold likewise cause rheums and defluxions from the head. Bacon.

DE'FLY, dêf'lé. adv. [from deft.] Dexterously; skilfully. Obsolete. Properly deftly.

Lo, how finely the graces can it foot
To the instrument;
They dauncen defly, and singen soote,
In their merriment. Spenser.

DEFOEDA'TION, dêf-fé-dá'shŭn. n. s. [from defoedus, Lat.] The act of making filthy; pollution. This is no English word; at least, to make it English, it should be written defedation.

What native unextinguishable beauty must be impressed and instincted through the whole, which the defœdation of so many parts by a bad printer, and a worse editor, could not hinder from shining forth! Bentley.

DEFO'RCEMENT, dé-fôrse'mĕnt. n. s. [from force.] A withholding of lands and tenements by force from the right owner.

To DEFO'RM, dé-fôrm'. v. n. [deformo, Lat.]

1. To disfigure; to make ugly; to spoil the form of any thing.

I that am curtail'd of all fair proportion,
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up.
Shakspeare.

Wintry blasts
Deform the year delightless. Thomson.

2. To dishonour; to make ungraceful.

Old men with dust deform'd their hoary hair. Dryden.

DEFO'RM, dé-fôrm'. adj. [deformis, Lat.] Ugly; disfigured; of an irregular form.

I did proclaim
That whoso kill'd that monster most deform,
Should have mine only daughter to his dame. Spenser.

So spake the griesly terror; and in shape,
So speaking and so threatening, grew tenfold
More dreadful and deform. Milton.

Sight so deform what heart of rock could long
Dry-eyed behold? Milton.

DEFORMA'TION, dêf-fôr-má'shŭn.[530] n. s. [deformatio, Lat.] A defacing; a disfiguring.

DEFO'RMED, dé-fôr'mĕd. participial. adj. Ugly; wanting natural beauty.

DEFO'RMEDLY, dé-fôr'mĕd-lé.[364] adv. [from deform.] In an ugly manner.

DEFO'RMEDNESS, dé-fôr'mĕd-nĕs. n. s. [from deformed.] Ugliness; a disagreeable form.

DEFO'RMITY, dé-fôr'mé-té. n. s. [deformitas, Latin.]

1. Ugliness; illfavouredness.

I, in this weak piping time of peace,
Have no delight to pass away the time,
Unless to spy my shadow in the sun,
And descant on my own deformity. Shakspeare.

Proper deformity seems not in the fiend
So horrid as in woman. Shakspeare.

Where sits deformity to mock my body,
To shape my legs of an unequal size,
To disproportion me in every part. Shakspeare.

Why should not man,
Retaining still divine similitude,
In part from such deformities be free,
And, for his Maker's image sake, exempt? Milton.

2. Ridiculousness; the quality of something worthy to be laughed at, or censured.

In comedy there is somewhat more of the worse likeness to be taken, because it is often to produce laughter, which is occasioned by the sight of some deformity. Dryden.

3. Irregularity; inordinateness.

No glory is more to be envied than that of due reforming either church or state, when deformities are such, that the perturbation and novelty are not like to exceed the benefit of reforming. King Charles.

The choosing of a delicate before a more ordinary dish, is to be done as other human actions are, in which there are no degrees and precise natural limits described. Taylor.

2. Dainty; desirous of curious meats.

3. Choice; select; excellent.

4. Pleasing to the senses.

5. Fine; not coarse; consisting of small parts.

As much blood passeth through the lungs as through all the body; the circulation is quicker, and heat greater, and their texture is extremely delicate. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

6. Of polite manners; not gross, or coarse.

7. Soft; effeminate; unable to bear hardships.

Witness this army, of such mass and charge,
Led by a delicate and tender prince. Shaksp.

Tender and delicate persons must needs be oft angry, they have so many things to trouble them, which more robust natures have little sense of. Bacon.

8. Pure; clear.

Where they most breed and haunt, I have observ'd
The air is delicate. Shaksp.

DE'LICATELY, dèl'è-kâte-lè. adv. [from delicate.]

1. Beautifully; with soft elegance.

That which will distinguish his style from all other poets, is the elegance of his words, and the numerousness of his verse: there is nothing so delicately turned in all the Roman language. Dryden.

Ladies like variegated tulips show,
'Tis to their changes half their charms we owe;
Such happy spots the nice admirer take,
Fine by defect, and delicately weak. Pope.

2. Finely; not coarsely.

3. Daintily.

Eat not delicately, or nicely; that is, be not troublesome to thyself or others in the choice of thy meats, or the delicacy of thy sauces. Taylor.

4. Choicely.

5. Politely.

6. Effeminately.

DE'LICATENESS, dèl'è-kâte-nês. n.s. [from delicate.] The state of being delicate; tenderness; softness; effeminacy.

DE'LICATES, dèl'è-kâts. n. s. [from deli-cate.] Niceties; rarities; that which is choice and dainty.

The shepherd's homely curds,
His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
All which secure and sweetly he enjoys,
Are far beyond a prince's delicates. Shaksp.

They their appetites not only feed
With delicates of leaves and marshy weed,
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land. Dryden.

With abstinence all delicates he sees,
And can regale himself with toast and cheese.
King's Cookery.

DE'LICES, dèl'è-sêz. n. s. pl. [deliciæ, Lat.] Pleasures. This word is merely French.

And now he has pour'd out his idle mind
In dainty delices and lavish joys,
Having his warlike weapons cast behind,
And flows in pleasures and vain pleasing toys.
Spenser.

DELI'CIOUS, dè-lîsh'ûs.[307] adj. [delicieux, Fr. from delicatus, Lat.] Sweet; delicate; that affords delight; agreeable; charming; grateful to the sense or mind.

It is highly probable, that upon Adam's disobedience Almighty God chased him out of Paradise, the fairest and most delicious part of the earth, into some other the most barren and unpleasant. Woodward.

In his last hours his easy wit display:
Like the rich fruit he seems, delicious in decay.
Smith.

Still on that breast enamour'd let me lie,
Still drink delicious poison from thy eye. Pope.

DELI'CIOUSLY, dè-lîsh'ûs-lè. adv. [from delicious.] Sweetly; pleasantly; delightfully.

How much she hath glorified herself and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her. Revelation.

DELI'CIOUSNESS, dè-lîsh'ûs-nês. n.s. [from delicious.] Delight; pleasure; joy.

The sweetest honey
Is loathsome in its own deliciousness,
And in the taste confounds the appetite. Shaksp.

Let no man judge of himself, or of the blessings and efficacy of the sacrament itself, by any sensible relish, by the gust and deliciousness, which he sometimes perceives, and at other times does not perceive. Taylor.

DELIGA'TION, dèl-lè-gâ'shûn. n. s. [deliga-tio, Lat.] A binding up in chirurgery.

1. To dig; to open the ground with a spade.

It shall go hard
But I will delve one yard below the mines,
And blow them at the moon. Shaksp.

Delve of convenient depth your thrashing floor;
With temper'd clay then fill and face it o'er.
Dryden.

The filthy swine with delving snout
The rooted forest undermine. Philips.

2. To fathom; to sift; to sound one's opinion. Figuratively.

What's his name and birth?
—I cannot delve him to the root: his father
Was call'd Sicilius. Shaksp.

DELVE, dėlv. n. s. [from the verb.] A ditch; a pit; a pitfal; a den; a cave.

He by and by
His feeble feet directed to the cry;
Which to that shady delve him brought at last,
Where Mammon erst did sun his treasury. Spenser.

Such a light and mettled dance
Saw you never yet in France;
And by leadmen, for the nonce,
That turn round like grindle-stones,
Which they dig out fro' the delves,
For their bairns bread, wives, and selves.
Ben Jonson.

DELVE of Coal, dėlv. A certain quantity of coal dug in the mine or pit. Dict.

DE'LVER, dėl'vůr.[98] n. s. [from delve.] A digger; one that opens the ground with a spade.

DE'LUGE, dėl'lůje. n. s. [deluge, Fr. from diluvium, Latin.]

1. A general inundation; laying entirely under water.

The apostle doth plainly intimate, that the old world was subject to perish by a deluge, as this is subject to perish by conflagration. Burnet's Theory.

2. An overflowing of the natural bounds of a river.

But if with bays and dams they strive to force
His channel to a new or narrow course,
No longer then within his banks he dwells,
First to a torrent, then a deluge swells. Denham.

3. Any sudden and resistless calamity.

To DE'LUGE, dėl'lůje. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To drown; to lay totally under water.

The restless flood the land would overflow,
By which the delug'd earth would useless grow.
Blackmore.

Still the battering waves rush in
Implacable, till delug'd by the foam,
The ship sinks, found'ring in the vast abyss.
Philips.

2. To overwhelm; to cause to sink under the weight of any calamity.

At length corruption, like a general flood,
Shall deluge all. Pope.

And fondly mourn'd the dear delusion gone. Prior.

DELU'SIVE, dė-lů'sîv.[158 428] adj. [from delusus, Lat.] Apt to deceive, beguiling; imposing on.

When fir'd with passion, we attack the fair,
Delusive sighs and brittle vows we bear. Prior

The happy whimsey you pursue,
Till you at length believe it true;
Caught by your own delusive art,
You fancy first, and then assert. Prior.

While the base and groveling multitude were listening to the delusive deities, those of a more erect aspect and exalted spirit separated themselves from the rest. Tatler.

Phænomena so delusive, that it is very hard to escape imposition and mistake. Woodward.

DELU'SORY, dė-lů'sůr-ė.[557 429] adj. [from delusus, Latin.] Apt to deceive.

This confidence is founded on no better foundation than a delusory prejudice. Glanville.

DE'MAGOGUE, dėm'ă-gŏg.[338] n. s. [δημαγωγος.] A ringleader of the rabble; a popular and factious orator.

Who were the chief demagogues and patrons of tumults, to send for them, to flatter and embolden them. King Charles.

A plausible insignificant word, in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and dreadful weapon. South.

Demosthenes and Cicero, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks call it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seem to differ in their practice. Swift.

DEMA'IN, DEME'AN, DEME'SNE, dè-mène'. n. s. [domaine, Fr.]

1. That land which a man holds originally of himself, called dominium by the civilians, and opposed to feodum, or fee, which signifies those that are held of a superior lord. It is sometimes used also for a distinction between those lands that the lord of the manor has in his own hands, or in the hands of his lessee, demised or let upon a rent for a term of years or life, and such other lands appertaining to the said manor as belong to free or copyholders. Phillips.

2. Estate in land.

Having now provided
A gentleman of noble parentage,
Of fair demesnes, youthful, and nobly allied. Shakspeare.

That earldom indeed had a royal jurisdiction and seigniory, though the lands of that county in demesne were possessed for the most part by the ancient inheritors. Davies.

3. Land adjoining to the mansion, kept in the lord's own hand.

Those acts for planting forest trees have hitherto been wholly ineffectual, except about the demesnes of a few gentlemen; and even there, in general, very unskilfully made. Swift.

To DEMA'ND, dè-mând'.[79] v. a. [demander, Fr.]

1. To claim; to ask for with authority.

The pound of flesh, which I demand of him,
Is dearly bought; 'tis mine, and I will have it. Shaksp.

2. To question; to interrogate.

And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered? 2 Samuel.

If any friend of Cæsar's demand why Brutus rose against Cæsar, this is my answer: Not that I loved Cæsar less, but that I loved Rome more. Shaksp.

Young one,
Inform us of thy fortunes; for it seems,
They crave to be demanded. Shaksp.

The oracle of Apollo being demanded, when the war and misery of Greece should have an end, replied, When they would double the altar in Delos, which was of a cubick form. Peacham on Geometry.

3. [In law.] To prosecute in a real action.

DEMA'ND, dè-mând'. n. s. [demande, Fr.]

1. A claim; a challenging; the asking of any thing with authority.

This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones. Daniel.

Giving vent, gives life and strength, to our appetites; and he that has the confidence to turn his wishes into demands, will be but a little way from thinking he ought to obtain them. Locke.

2. A question; an interrogation.

3. The calling for a thing in order to purchase it.

My bookseller tells me, the demand for those my papers increases daily. Addison.

4. [In law.] The asking of what is due. It hath also a proper signification distinguished from plaint; for all civil actions are pursued either by demands or plaints, and the pursuer is called demandant or plaintiff. There are two manners of demands, the one of deed, the other in law: in deed, as in every præcipe, there is express demand; in law, as every entry in land-distress for rent, taking or seizing of goods and such like acts, which may be don without any words, are demands in law. Blount.

DEMA'NDABLE, dè-mân'dâ-bl. adj. [from demand.] That may be demanded; requested; asked for.

All sums demandable, for licence of alienation to be made of lands holden in chief, have been stayed in the way to the hanaper. Bacon.

1. To behave; to carry one's self.

Those plain and legible lines of duty requiring us to demean ourselves to God humbly and devoutly, to our governors obediently, and to our neighbours justly, and to ourselves soberly and temperately. South.

A man cannot doubt but that there is a God; and that, according as he demeans himself towards him, he will make him happy or miserable for ever. Tillotson.

Strephon had long perplex'd his brains,
How with so high a nymph he might
Demean himself the wedding night. Swift.

2. To lessen; to debase; to undervalue.

Now, out of doubt, Antipholis is mad;
Else he would never so demean himself. Shaksp.

DEME'ANOUR, dè-mè'nûr.[314] n. s. [demener, Fr.] Carriage; behaviour.

Of so insupportable a pride he was, that where his deeds might well stir envy, his demeanour did rather breed disdain. Sidney.

Angels best like us, when we are most like unto them in all parts of decent demeanour. Hooker

His gestures fierce
He mark'd, and mad demeanour, then alone,
As he suppos'd, all unobserv'd, unseen. Milton.

Thus Eve, with sad demeanour meek,
Ill worthy I. Milton.

He was of a courage not to be daunted, which was manifested in all his actions, especially in his whole demeanour at Rhee, both at the landing, and upon the retreat. Clarendon.

DEME'ANS, dè-mènz'. n. s. pl. properly demesnes. An estate in lands; that which a man possesses in his own right.

To DEME'NTATE, dè-mèn'tâte. v. n. [demento, Lat.] To make mad.

DEMO'NSTRABLE, dê-môn'strâ-bl. adj. [demonstrabilis, Lat.] That may be proved beyond doubt or contradiction; that may be made not only probable but evident.

The grand articles of our belief are as demonstrable as geometry. Glanville.

DEMO'NSTRABLY, dê-môn'strâ-blê. adv. [from demonstrable.] In such a manner as admits of certain proof; evidently; beyond possibility of contradiction.

He should have compelled his ministers to execute the law, in cases that demonstrably concerned the publick peace. Clarendon.

To DEMO'NSTRATE, dê-môn'strâte.[91] v. a. [demonstro, Latin.] To prove with the highest degree of certainty; to prove in such a manner as reduces the contrary position to evident absurdity.

We cannot demonstrate these things so, as to shew that the contrary often involves a contradiction. Til.

DEMONSTRA'TION, dêm-môn-strâ'shûn.[530] n. s. [demonstratio, Latin.]

1. The highest degree of deducible or argumental evidence; the strongest degree of proof; such proof as not only evinces the position proved to be true, but shows the contrary position to be absurd and impossible.

What appeareth to be true by strong and invincible demonstration, such as wherein it is not by any way possible to be deceived, thereunto the mind doth necessarily yield. Hooker.

Where the agreement or disagreement of any thing is plainly and clearly perceived, it is called demonstration. Locke.

2. Indubitable evidence of the senses or reason.

Which way soever we turn ourselves, we are encountered with clear evidences and sensible demonstrations of a Deity. Tillotson.

DEMO'NSTRATIVE, dê-môn'strâ-tîv. adj. [demonstrativus, Latin.]

1. Having the power of demonstration; invincibly conclusive; certain.

An argument necessary and demonstrative, is such as, being proposed unto any man, and understood, the man cannot choose but inwardly yield. Hooker.

2. Having the power of expressing clearly and certainly.

Painting is necessary to all other arts, because of the need which they have of demonstrative figures, which often give more light to the understanding than the clearest discourses. Dryden.

DEMO'NSTRATIVELY, dê-môn'strâ-tîv-lê. [adv. from demonstrative.]

1. With evidence not to be opposed or doubted.

No man, in matters of this life, requires an assurance either of the good which he designs, or of the evil which he avoids, from arguments demonstratively certain. South.

First, I demonstratively prove,
That feet were only made to move. Prior.

2. Clearly; plainly; with certain knowledge.

Demonstratively understanding the simplicity of perfection, it was not in the power of earth to work them from it. Brown.

DEMONSTRA'TOR, dĕm-môn-strā'tŭr.[521] n. s. [from demonstrate.] One that proves; one that teaches; one that demonstrates.

DEMONSTRA'TORY, dĕ-mŏns'strā-tŭr-ĕ.[512] adj. [from demonstrate.] Having the tendency to demonstrate, DEMU'LCENT, dĕ-mŭl'sĕnt. adj. [demulcens, Lat.] Softening, mollifying; assuasive.

Pease, being deprived of any aromatick parts are mild and demulcent in the highest degree, but, being full of aerial particles, are flatulent, when dissolved by digestion. Arbuthnot.

To DEMU'R, dĕ-mûr'. v. n. [demeurer, French; dimorare, Italian; demorari, Lat.]

2. To pause in uncertainty; to suspend determination; to hesitate; to delay the conclusion of an affair.

Upon this rub the English ambassadours thought it to demur, and so sent into England to receive directions from the lords of the council. Haywood.

Running into demands, they expect from us a sudden resolution in things wherein the devil of Delphos would demur. Brown.

He must be of a very sluggish or querulous humour, that shall demur upon setting out, or demand higher encouragements than the hope of heaven. Decay of Piety.

News of my death from rumour he receiv'd,
And what he wish'd he easily believ'd;
But long demurr'd, though from my hand he knew
I liv'd, so loth he was to think it true. Dryden.

3. To doubt; to have scruples or difficulties; to deliberate.

There is something in our composition that thinks and apprehends, and reflects and deliberates, determines and doubts, consents and denies; that wills and demurs, and resolves, and chuses, and rejects. Bentley.

To DEMU'R, dĕ-mûr'. v. a. To doubt of.

The latter I demur; for in their looks
Much reason, and in their actions, oft appears. Milton.

DEMU'R, dĕ-mûr'. n. s. [from the verb.] Doubt; hesitation; suspense of opinion.

O progeny of Heav'n, empyreal thrones!
With reason hath deep silence and demur
Seiz'd us, though undismay'd. Milton.

Certainly the highest and dearest concerns of a temporal life are infinitely less valuable than those of an eternal; and consequently ought, without any demur at all, to be sacrificed to them, whensoever they come in competition with them. South.

All my demurs but double his attacks,
At last he whispers, Do, and we go snacks. Pope.

DEMU'RE, dĕ-mûre'. adj. [des mœurs, French.]

1. Sober; decent.

Lo! two most lovely virgins came in place,
With countenance demure, and modest grace. Spenser.

Come, pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, stedfast, and demure. Milton.

2. Grave; affectedly modest: it is now generally taken in a sense of contempt.

After a demure travel of regard, I tell them I know my place, as I would they should do theirs. Shakspeare.

There be many wise men, that have secret hearts and transparent countenances; yet this would be done with a demure abasing of your eye sometimes. Bacon.

A cat lay and looked so demure as if there had been neither life nor soul in her. L'Estrange.

So cat, transform'd, sat gravely and demure,
Till mouse appear'd and thought himself secure. Dryden.

Jove sent and found, far in a country scene,
Truth, innocence, good-nature, look serene;
From which ingredients, first the dex'trous boy
Pick'd the demure, the awkward, and the coy. Swift.

To DEMU'RE, dĕ-mûre'. v. n. [from the noun.] To look with an affected modesty: not used.

Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes,
And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour,
Demuring upon me. Shakspeare.

DEMU'RELY, dĕ-mûre'lĕ. adv. [from demure.]

1. With affected modesty; solemnly; with pretended gravity.

Put on a sober habit,
Talk with respect, and swear but now and then,
Wear prayer-books in my pocket, look demurely. Shakspeare.

Esop's damsel, turned from a cat to a woman, sat very demurely at the board's end, till a mouse ran before her. Bacon.

Next stood hypocrisy with holy leer,
Soft smiling and demurely looking down;
But hid the dagger underneath the gown. Dryden.

2. In the following line it is the same with solemnly.

Hark, how the drums demurely wake the sleepers! Shakspeare.

DEMU'RENESS, dĕ-mûre'nĕs. n. s. [from demure.]

1. Modesty; soberness; gravity of aspect.

Her eyes having in them such a cheerfulness, as nature seemed to smile in them; though her mouth and cheeks obeyed to that pretty demureness, which the more one marked, the more one would judge the poor soul apt to believe. Sidney.

2. Affected modesty; pretended gravity.

DEMU'RRAGE, dĕ-mûr'rĭje. n. s. [from demur.] An allowance made by merchants to masters of ships, for their stay in a port beyond the time appointed.

DEMU'RRER, dĕ-mûr'ûr.[98] n. s. [demeurer, French; i. e. manere in aliquo loco, vel morari.] A kind of pause upon a point of difficulty in an action; for, in every action, the controversy consists either in the fact, or in the law: if in the fact, that is tried by the jury; if in law, then is the case plain to the judge, or so hard and rare, as it breedeth just doubt. I call that plain to the judge, wherein he is assured of the law; and in such case the judge with his associates proceeds to judgment without farther work. But when it is doubtful to him and his associates, then is their stay made, and a time taken, either for the court to think farther upon it, and to agree, if they can; or else for all the justices to meet together in the Chequer-chamber; and, upon hearing that which the serjeants can say of both parts, to advise and set down as law, whatsoever they conclude firm, without farther remedy. Cowell.

A prohibition was granted, and hereunto there was a demurrer. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DEN, dĕn. n. s. [ðen, Saxon.]

1. A cavern or hollow running horizontally, or with a small obliquity, under ground; distinct from a hole which runs down perpendicularly.

They here dispersed, some in the air, some on the earth, some in the waters, some amongst the minerals, dens, and caves, under the earth. Hooker.

2. The cave of a wild beast.

What, shall they seek the lion in his den,
And fright him there? Shakspeare.

The tyrant's den, whose use, though lost to fame,
Was now the apartment of the royal dame;
The cavern only to her father known,
By him was to his darling daughter shown. Dryden.

'Tis then the shapeless bear his den forsakes;
In woods and fields a wide destruction makes. Dryden.

3. Den, the termination of a local name, may signify either a valley or a woody place; for the Saxon ðen imports both. Gibson's Camden.

DENA'Y, dĕ-nā'. n. s. [a word formed between deny and nay.] Denial; refusal.

To her in haste, give her this jewel: say,
My love can give no place, bide no denay. Shakspeare.

DENI'ABLE, dĕ-nī'ă-bl. adj. [from deny.] That may be denied; that to which one may refuse belief.

The negative authority is also deniable by reason. Brown.

DENI'AL, dĕ-nī'ăl. n. s. [from deny.]

1. Negation; the contrary to affirmation.

2. Negation; the contrary to confession.

No man more impudent to deny, where proofs were not manifest; no man more ready to confess, with a repenting manner of aggravating his own evil, where denial would but make the fault fouler. Sidney.

3. Refusal; the contrary to grant, allowance, or concession.

Here comes your father; never make denial:
I must and will have Catharine to my wife. Shakspeare.

The denial of landing, and hasty warning us away, troubled us much. Bacon.

He, at ev'ry fresh attempt, is repell'd
With faint denials, weaker than before. Dryden.

4. Abjuration; the contrary to acknowledgment of adherence.

We may deny God in all those acts that are capable of being morally good or evil: those are the proper scenes, in which we act our confessions or denials of him. South.

DENI'ER, dĕ-nī'ûr.[98] n. s. [from deny.]

1. A contradictor; an opponent; one that holds the negative of a proposition.

By the word Virtue the affirmer intends our whole duty to God and man, and the denier by the word Virtue means only courage, or, at most, our duty towards our neighbour, without including the idea of the duty which we owe to God. Watts.

2. A disowner; one that does not own or acknowledge.

If it was so fearful when Christ looked his denier into repentance, what will it be when he shall look him into destruction? South.

3. A refuser; one that refuses.

It may be I am esteemed by my denier sufficient of myself to discharge my duty to God as a priest, though not to men as a prince. King Charles.

DENIE'R, dĕ-nēre'. n. s. [from denarius, Lat. It is pronounced as deneer, in two syllables.] A small denomination of French money; the twelfth part of the sous.

——No, not a denier. Shakspeare.

To DE'NIGRATE, dê-nî'grâte. v. a. [denigro, Lat.] To blacken; to make black.

By suffering some impression from fire, bodies are casually or artificially denigrated in their natural complexion: thus are charcoals made black by an infection of their own suffitus. Brown.

Hartshorn, and other white bodies, will be denigrated by heat; yet camphire would not at all lose its whiteness. Boyle.

DENIGRA'TION, dên-ê-grâ'shûn. n. s. [denigratio, Latin.] A blackening, or making black.

These are the advenient and artificial ways of denigration, answerably whereto may be the natural progress. Brown.

In several instances of denigration, the metals are worn off, or otherwise reduced into very minute parts. Boyle.

DENIZA'TION, dên-nê-zâ'shûn. n. s. [from denizen.] The act of enfranchising, or making free.

That the mere Irish were reputed aliens, appears by the charters of denization, which in all ages were purchased by them. Davies.

DE'NIZEN, DE'NISON, dên'ê-zn.[103 170] n.s. [from dynasdyn, a man of the city; or dinesydd, free of the city, Welsh.] A freeman; one enfranchised

Denizen is a British law term, which the Saxons and Angles found here, and retained. Davies.

Thus th' Almighty Sire began: ye gods,
Natives, or denizens, of blest abodes,
From whence these murmurs? Dryden.

A great many plants will hardly, with nursing, be made to produce their seed out of their native soil; but corn, so necessary for all people, is fitted to grow and to seed as a free denizen of the world. Grew.

He summons straight his denizens of air;
The lucid squadrons round the sails repair. Pope.

To DE'NIZEN, dên'ê-zn. v. a. [from the noun.] To enfranchise; to make free.

Pride, lust, covetize, being several
To these three places, yet all are in all;
Mingled thus, their issue is incestuous;
Falsehood, is denizen'd, virtue is barbarous. Donne.

DENO'MINABLE, dê-nôm'ê-nâ-bl. adj. [denomino, Latin,] That may be named or denoted.

An inflammation consists of a sanguineous affluxion, or else is denominable from other humours, according to the predominacy of melancholy, phlegm, or choler. Brown.

To DENO'MINATE, dê-nôm'ê-nâte. v. a. [denomino, Latin.] To name; to give a name to.

The commendable purpose of consecration being not of every one understood, they have been construed as though they had superstitiously meant either that those places, which were denominated of angels and saints, should serve for the worship of so glorious creatures; or else those glorious creatures for defence, protection, and patronage of such places. Hooker.

Predestination is destructive to all that is established among men, to all that is most precious to human nature, to the two faculties that denominate us men, understanding and will: for what use can we have of our understandings, if we cannot do what we know to be our duty? And if we act not voluntarily, what exercise have we of our wills? Hammond.

DENOMINA'TION, dê-nôm-ê-nâ'shûn. n. s. denominatio, Latin.] A name given to a thing, which commonly marks some principal quality of it.

But is there any token, denomination, or monument of the Gauls yet remaining in Ireland, as there is of the Scythians? Spenser.

The liking or disliking of the people gives the play the denomination of good or bad; but does not really make or constitute it such. Dryden.

Philosophy, the great idol of the learned part of the heathen world, has divided it into many sects and denominations; as Stoicks, Peripateticks, Epicureans, and the like. South.

All men are sinners: the most righteous among us must confess ourselves to come under that denomination. Rogers.

DENO'MINATIVE, dê-nôm'ê-nâ-tîv. adj. [from denominate.]

1. That gives a name; that confers a distinct appellation.
2. That obtains a distinct appellation. This would be more analogically denominable.

The least denominative part of time is a minute, the greatest integer being a year. Cocker.

DENOMINA'TOR, dê-nôm'ê-nâ-tûr[520] n. s. [from denominate.] The giver of a name; the person or thing that causes an appellation.

Both the seas of one name should have one common denominator. Brown.

DENOMINATOR of a Fraction, is the number below the line, shewing the nature and quality of the parts which any integer is supposed to be divided into: thus in $\frac{6}{8}$, 8 the denominator shows you that the integer is supposed to be divided into 8 parts, or half quarters; and the numerator 6 shows, that you take 6 of such parts, i. e. three quarters of the whole. Harris.

When a single broken number or fraction hath for its denominator a number consisting of an unit, in the first place towards the left hand, and nothing but cyphers from the unit towards the right hand, it is then more aptly and rightly called a decimal fraction. Cocker's Arithmetick.

Denominator of any proportion, is the quotient arising from the division of the antecedent by the consequent: thus 6, is the denominator of the proportion that 30 hath to 5, because 5) 30 (6. This is also called the exponent of the proportion, or ratio. Harris.

The same thing I have tried by letting a globe rest, and raising or depressing the eye, or otherwise moving it, to make the angle of a just magnitude Newton.

3. To humble; to deject; to sink.

Others depress their own minds, despond at the first difficulty, and conclude that the making any progress in knowledge is above their capacities. Locke.

If we consider how often it breaks the gloom, which is apt to depress the mind, with transient unexpected gleams of joy, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life. Addis.

Passion can depress or raise
The heavenly, as the human mind. Pope.

DEPRE'SSION, dé-présh'ůn. n. s. [depressio, Lat.]

1. The act of pressing down.

Bricks of a rectangular form, if laid one by another in a level row between supporters sustaining the two ends, all the pieces between will necessarily sink by their own gravity; and much more if they suffer any depression by other weight above them. Wotton.

2. The sinking or falling in of a surface.

The beams of light are such subtile bodies, that, in respect of them, even surfaces, that are sensibly smooth, are not exactly so: they have their own degree of roughness, consisting of little protuberances and depressions; and consequently such inequalities may suffice to give bodies different colours, as we see in marble that appears white or black, or red, or blue, even when most carefully polished. Boyle.

If the bone be much depressed, and the fissure considerably large, it is then at your choice, whether you will enlarge that fissure or continue it for the evacuation of the matter, and forbear the use of the trepan; not doubting but a small depression of the bone will either rise, or cast off, by the benefit of nature. Wiseman.

3. The act of humbling; abasement.

Depression of the nobility may make a king more absolute, but less safe. Bacon.

DEPRESSION, of an Equation [in algebra] is the bringing it into lower and more simple terms by division. Dict.

Most happy he
Whose least delight sufficeth to deprive
Remembrance of all pains which him opprest. Spenser.

4. To put out of an office.

A minister, deprived for inconformity, said, that if they deprived him, it should cost an hundred men's lives. Bacon.

DEPTH, dép*th*. n. s. [from deep, of diep, Dutch.]

1. Deepness; the measure of any thing from the surface downward.

As for men, they had buildings in many places higher than the depth of the water. Bacon.

We have large and deep caves of several depths: the deepest are sunk six hundred fathoms. Bacon.

The left to that unhappy region tends,
Which to the depth of Tartarus descends. Dryden.

For tho', in nature, depth and height
Are equally held infinite;
In poetry the height we know,

2. Deep place; not a shoal.

The false tides skim o'er the cover'd land,
And seamen with dissembled depths betray. Dryden.

3. The abyss; a gulf of infinite profundity.

When he prepared the heavens I was there: when he set a compass upon the face of the depth, then I was by him. Proverbs.

4. The middle or height of a season.

And in the depth of winter, in the night,
You plough the raging seas to coasts unknown. Denham.

The earl of Newcastle, in the depth of winter, rescued the city of York from the rebels. Clarendon.

5. Abstruseness; obscurity.

There are greater depths and obscurities in an elaborate and well-written piece of nonsense, than in the most abstruse tract of school-divinity. Addison.

DEPTH of a Squadron or Battalion, is the number of men in a file. Military Dict.

Of all the fav'rites that the absent king
In deputation left behind him here,
When he was personal in the Irish war. Shakspeare.

He looks not below the moon, but hath designed the regiment of sublunary affairs into sublunary deputations. Brown.

The authority of conscience stands founded upon its vicegerency and deputation under God. South.

To DEPU'TE, dé-půte'. v. a. [deputer, Fr.] To send with a special commission; to impower one to transact instead of another.

And Absalom said unto him, See thy matters are good and right, but there is no man deputed of the king to hear. 2 Samuel.

And Linus thus, deputed by the rest,
The heroes welcome and their thanks express'd. Roscommon.

A bishop, by deputing a priest or chaplain to administer the sacraments, may remove him. Ayliffe.

DE'PUTY, dép'ů-té. n. s. [deputé, French; from deputatus, Latin.]

1. A lieutenant; a viceroy; one that is appointed by a special commission to govern or act instead of another.

He exerciseth dominion over them as the vicegerent and deputy of Almighty God. Hale.

He was vouched his immediate deputy upon earth, and viceroy of the creation, and lord lieutenant of the world. South.

2. Any one that transacts business for another.

Presbyters, absent through infirmity from their churches, might be said to preach by those deputies, who, in their stead, did but read homilies. Hooker

A man hath a body, and that body is confined to a place; but where friendship is, all offices of life are, as it were, granted to him and his deputy; for he may exercise them by his friend. Bacon.

3. [In law.] One that exercises any office or other thing in another man's right, whose forfeiture or misdemeanour shall cause the officer or person for whom he acts to lose his office. Phillips.

To DEQUA'NTITATE, dè-kwân'tè-tâte. v. a. [from de and quantitas, Lat.] To diminish the quantity of.

This we affirm of pure gold; for that which is current, and passeth in stamp amongst us, by reason of its allay, which is a proportion of silver or copper mixed therewith, is actually dequantitated by fire, and possibly by frequent extinction. Brown

DER, dûr. A term used in the beginning of names of places. It is generally to be derived from ðeop. a wild beast, unless the place stands upon a river; for then it may rather be fetched from the British dur, i. e. water. Gibson's Camden.

To DERA'CINATE, dè-râs'sè-nâte. v. a. [deraciner, Fr]

1. To pluck or tear up by the roots.

Her fallow lees
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory

1. A mocker; a scoffer.

Upon the wilful violation of oaths, execrable blasphemies, and like contempts offered by deriders of religion, fearful tokens of divine revenge have been known to follow. Hooker.

2. A droll; a buffoon.

DERI'SION, dè-rîzh'ûn. n. s. [derisio, Lat.]

1. The act of deriding or laughing at.

Are we grieved with the scorn and derision of the profane? Thus was the blessed Jesus despised and rejected of men. Rogers.

Vanity is the natural weakness of an ambitious man, which exposes him to the secret scorn and derision of those he converses with. Addison.

2. Contempt; scorn; a laughing stock.

I am in derision daily; every one mocketh me. Jeremiah.

Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us. Psalms.

Ensnar'd, assaulted, overcome; led bound,
Thy foe's derision, captive, poor, and blind,
Into a dungeon thrust. Milton.

DERI'SIVE, dè-rî'sîv.[428] adj. [from deride.] Mocking; scoffing.

O'er all the dome they quaff, they feast;
Derisive taunts were spread from guest to guest,
And each in jovial mood his mate address'd. Pope.

DERI'SORY, dè-rî'sûr-è.[429] [512] adj. [derisorius, Lat.] Mocking; ridiculing.

DERI'VABLE, dè-rî'vâ-bl. adj. [from derive.] Attainable by right of descent or derivation.

God has declared this the eternal rule and standard of all honour derivable upon me, that those who honour him shall be honoured by him. South.

DERIVA'TION, dêr-è-vâ'shûn.[530] n. s. [derivatio, Lat.]

1. A draining of water; a turning of its course.

When the water began to swell, it would every way discharge itself by any descents or declivities of the ground; and these issues and derivations being once made, and supplied with new waters pushing them forwards, would continue their course till they arrived at the sea, just as other rivers do. Burnet.

2. [In grammar.] The tracing of a word from its original.

Your lordship here seems to dislike my taking notice that the derivation of the word Substance favours the idea we have of it; and your lordship tells me, that very little weight is to be laid on it, on a bare grammatical etymology. Locke.

3. The transmission of any thing from its source.

As touching traditional communication, and tradition of those truths that I call connatural and engraven, I do not doubt but many of those truths have had the help of that derivation. Hale.

4. [In medicine.] The drawing of a humour from one part of the body to another.

Derivation differs from revulsion only in the measure of the distance, and the force of the medicines used: if we draw it to some very remote, or, it may be, contrary part, we call that revulsion; if only to some neighbouring place, and by gentle means, we call it derivation. Wiseman.

5. The thing deduced or derived. Not used.

Most of them are the genuine derivations of the hypothesis they claim to. Glanville.

DERI'VATIVE, dè-rîv'â-tîv. adj. [derivativus, Latin.] Derived or taken from another.

As it is a derivative perfection, so it is a distinct kind of perfection from that which is in God. Hale.

DERI'VATIVE, dè-rîv'â-tîv.[157] n. s. [from the adjective.] The thing or word derived or taken from another.

For honour,
'Tis a derivative from me to mine,
And only that I stand for. Shakspeare.

The word Honestus originally and strictly signifies no more than creditable, and is but a derivative from Honor, which signifies credit or honour. South.

DERI'VATIVELY, dè-rîv'â-tîv-lè. adv. [from derivative.] In a derivative manner.

To DERI'VE, dè-rîve'. v. a. [deriver Fr. from derivo, Latin.]

1. To turn the course of water from its channel.

Company lessens the shame of vice by sharing it, and abates the torrent of a common odium by deriving it into many channels. South.

2. To deduce; as from a root, from a cause, from a principle.

They endeavour to derive the varieties of colours from the various proportion of the direct progress or motion of these globules to their circumvolution or motion about their own centre. Boyle.

Men derive their ideas of duration from their reflection on the train of ideas they observe to succeed one another in their own understandings. Locke.

From these two causes of the laxity and rigidity of the fibres, the methodists, an ancient set of physicians, derived all diseases of human bodies with a great deal of reason; for the fluids derive their qualities from the solids. Arbuthnot.

3. To communicate to another, as from the origin and source.

Christ having Adam's nature as we have, but incorrupt, deriveth not nature, but incorruption, and that immediately from his own person, unto all that belong unto him. Hooker.

4. To receive by transmission.

And through the watchmen who him never spied.
Hubberd's Tale.

The spirit of deep prophecy she hath;
What's past, and what's to come she can descry.
Shaksp.

That planet would, unto our eyes, descrying only that part whereon the light falls, appear to be horned as the moon seems. Raleigh.

And now their way to earth they had descried,
To paradise first tending. Milton.

Although the motion of light be not descried, no argument can be made from thence to prove that light is not a body. Digby.

A tow'r so high, it seem'd to reach the sky,
Stood on the roof, from whence we could descry
All Ilium. Denham.

Once more at least look back, said I;
Thyself in that large glass descry. Prior.

DESCRY', dê-skrî'. n. s. [from the verb.] Discovery; thing discovered.

How near's the other army?
—Near, and on speedy foot, the main descry
Stands on the hourly thought. Shaksp.

To DE'SECRATE, dês'sê-kråte. v. a. [desacro, Lat.] To divert from the purpose to which any thing is consecrated.

The founders of monasteries imprecated evil on those who should desecrate their donations.

DE'SERT, dêz'êrt. n. s. [desertum, Lat.] A wilderness; solitude; waste country; uninhabited place.

Be alive again,
And dare me to the desert with thy sword,
If trembling I inhabit, then protest me
The baby of a girl. Shaksp.

He, looking round on every side, beheld
A pathless desert, dusk with horrid shades. Milton.

DE'SERT, dêz-êrt'. adj. [desertus, Latin.] Wild; waste; solitary; uninhabited; uncultivated; untilled.

I have words
That would be howl'd out in the desert air,
Where hearing should not catch them. Shaksp.

He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness. Deuteronomy.

The promises and bargains between two men in a desert island are binding to them, though they are perfectly in a state of nature, in reference to one another. Locke.

To DESE'RT, dê-zêrt'. v. a. [deserter, Fr. desero, Lat.]

1. To forsake; to fall away from; to quit meanly or treacherously.

I do not remember one man, who heartily wished the passing of that bill, that ever deserted them till the kingdom was in a flame. Dryden.

2. To leave; to abandon.

What is it that holds and keeps the orbs in fixed stations and intervals, against an incessant and inherent tendency to desert them. Bentley.

3. To quit the army, or regiment, in which one is enlisted.

DESE'RT, dêz-zêrt'. n. s. [properly dessert: the word is originally French.] The last course; the fruit or sweet meats with which a feast is concluded. See DESSERT.

DESE'RT, dê-zêrt'. n. s. [from deserve.]

1. Qualities or conduct considered with respect to rewards or punishments; degree of merit or demerit.

Being of necessity a thing common, it is, through the manifold persuasions, dispositions, and occasions of men, with equal desert both of praise and dispraise, shunned by some, by others desired.
Hooker.

The base o' th' mount
Is rank'd with all deserts, all kind of natures,
That labour on the bosom of this sphere,
To propagate their states. Shaksp.

Use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Shaksp.

2. Proportional merit; claim to reward.

All desert imports an equality between the good conferred, and the good deserved, or made due.
South.

3. Excellence; right of reward; virtue.

More to move you,
Take my deserts to his, and join them both. Shaksp.

DESE'RTER, dê-zêr'tûr.[98] n. s. [from desert.]

1. He that has forsaken his cause or his post: commonly in an ill sense.

The members of both houses, who at first withdrew, were counted deserters, and outed of their places in parliament. King Charles.

Straight to their ancient cells, recall'd from air,
The reconcil'd deserters will repair. Dryden.

Hosts of deserters, who your honour sold;
And basely broke your faith for bribes of gold.
Dryden.

2. He that leaves the army in which he is enlisted.

They are the same deserters, whether they stay in our own camp, or run over to the enemy's.
Decay of Piety.

A deserter who came out of the citadel, says the garrison is brought to the utmost necessity. Tatler.

3. He that forsakes another; an abandoner.

The fair sex, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shown him more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus. Dryden.

Thou false guardian of a charge too good,
Thou mean deserter of thy brother's blood. Pope.

DESE'RTION, dê-zêr'shûn. n. s. [from desert.]

1. The act of forsaking or abandoning a cause or post.

Every compliance that we are persuaded to by one, is a contradiction to the commands of the other; and our adherence to one, will necessarily involve us in a desertion of the other. Rogers.

2. [In theology.] Spiritual despondency; a sense of the dereliction of God; an opinion that grace is withdrawn.

Christ hears and sympathizes with the spiritual agonies of a soul under desertion, or the pressures of some stinging affliction. South.

DESE'RTLESS, dê-zêrt'lês. adj. [from desert.] Without merit; without claim to favour or reward.

She said she lov'd,
Lov'd me desertless; who with shame confest,
Another flame had seized upon my breast. Dryd.

To DESE'RVE, dê-zêrv'. v. a. [deservir, Fr.] To be worthy of either good or ill.

Those they honoured, as having power to work or cease, as men deserved of them. Hooker.

Some of us love you well; and even those some
Envy your great deservings, and good name.
Shakspeare.

All friends shall taste
The wages of their virtue, and all foes,
The cup of their deservings. Shaksp.

What he deserves of you and me I know.
Shaksp.

Yet well, if here would end
The misery: I deserv'd it, and would bear
My own deservings. Milton.

A mother cannot give him death: though he Deserves it, he deserves it not from me. Dryden.

Since my Orazia's death I have not seen
A beauty so deserving to be queen. Dryden.

To DESE'RVE, dê-zêrv'. v. n. To be worthy of reward.

According to the rule of natural justice, one man may merit and deserve of another. South.

Courts are the places where best manners flourish,
Where the deserving ought to rise. Otway.

He had been a person of great deservings from the republick, was an admirable speaker, and very popular. Swift.

DESE'RVEDLY, dê-sêr'vêd-lê.[364] adv. [from deserve.] Worthily; according to desert, whether of good or evil.

For him I was not sent, nor yet to free
That people victor once, now vile and base,
Deservedly made vassal. Milton.

A man deservedly cuts himself off from the affections of that community which he endeavours to subvert. Addison.

DESE'RVER, dê-zêr'vûr.[98] n. s. [from deserve.] A man who merits rewards. It is used, I think, only in a good sense.

Their love is never link'd to the deserver,
Till his deserts are pass'd. Shaksp.

Heavy, with some high minds, is an over-weight of obligation; or otherwise great deservers do, perchance, grow intolerable presumers. Wotton.

Emulation will never be wanting amongst poets, when particular rewards and prizes are proposed to the best deservers. Dryden.

DESI'CCANTS, dê sîk'kânts. n. s. [from desiccate.] Applications that dry up the flow of sores; driers.

This, in the beginning, may be prevented by desiccants, and wasted. Wiseman.

To DE'SICCATE, dê-sîk'kåte.[503] v. a. desicco, Lat.]

1. To dry up; to exhaust of moisture.

In bodies desiccated by heat or age, when the native spirit goeth forth, and the moisture with it, the air with time getteth into the pores. Bacon.

Seminal ferments were elevated from the sea, or some desiccated places thereof, by the heat of the sun. Hale.

2. To exhale moisture.

Where there is moisture enough, or superfluous, there wine helpeth to digest and desiccate the moisture. Bacon.

DESICCA'TION, dês-îk-kå'shûn. n. s. [from desiccate.] The act of making dry; the state of being dried.

If the spirits issue out of the body, there followeth desiccation, induration, and consumption. Bacon.

Eclipses are of wonderful assistance toward the solution of this so desirable and so much desiderated problem. Cheyne.

DESIDERA'TUM, dê-sîd-dê-rå'tûm. [Lat.] Somewhat which inquiry has not yet been able to settle or discover: as, the longitude is the desideratum of navigation. The trisection of an angle, and the quadrature of a circle, are the desiderata of geometry.

DESI'DIOSE, dê-sîd'ê-ôze. adj. [desidiosus, Lat.] Idle; lazy; heavy. Dict.

To DESI'GN, dê-sîne'.[447] v. a. [designo, Lat. dessiner, Fr.]

1. To purpose; to intend any thing.
2. To form or order with a particular purpose: with for.

The acts of religious worship were purposely designed for the acknowledgment of a Being, whom the most excellent creatures are bound to adore as well as we. Stillingfleet.

You are not for obscurity design'd,
But like the sun, must cheer all human kind. Dryden.

3. To devote intentionally: with to.

One of those places was designed by the old man to his son. Clarendon.

He was born to the inheritance of a splendid fortune; he was designed to the study of the law. Dryden.

4. To plan; to project; to form in idea.

We are to observe whether the picture or outlines be well drawn, or, as more elegant artizans term it, well designed; then, whether it be well coloured; which be the two general heads. Wotton.

Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
The new erected seat, and draws the lines. Dryden.

5. To mark out by particular tokens Little used.

'Tis not enough to make a man a subject, to convince him that there is regal power in the world; but there must be ways of designing and knowing the person to whom this regal power of right belongs. Locke.

DESI'GN, dê-sîne'. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. An intention; a purpose.
2. A scheme; a plan of action.

Is he a prudent man, as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day, without any prospect to the remaining part of his life? Tillotson.

3. A scheme formed to the detriment of another.

A sedate settled design upon another man's life, put him in a state of war with him against whom he has declared such an intention. Locke.

4. The idea which an artist endeavours to execute or express.

I doubt not but in the designs of several Greek medals, one may often see the hand of an Appelles or Protogenes. Addison.

Thy hand strikes out some new design,
Where life awakes and dawns at every line. Pope.

DESI'GNABLE, dê-sîne'â-bl. adj. [designo, Lat.] Distinguishable; capable to be particularly marked out.

The power of all natural agents is limited: the mover must be confined to observe these proportions, and cannot pass over all these infinite designable degrees in an instant. Digby.

DESIGNA'TION, dês-sîg-nâ'shûn. n. s. [designatio, Lat.]

1. The act of pointing or marking out by some particular token.

This is a plain designation of the duke of Marlborough: one kind of stuff used to fatten land is called marle, and every body knows that borough is a name for a town. Swift.

2. Appointment; direction.

William the conqueror forbore to use that claim in the beginning, but mixed it with a titulary pretence, grounded upon the will and designation of Edward the confessor. Bacon.

3. Import; intention.

Finite and infinite seem to be looked upon by the mind as the modes of quantity, and to be attributed primarily in their first designation only to those things which have parts, and are capable of increase or diminution. Locke.

DESI'GNEDLY, dê-sî'nêd-lê.[364] adv. [from design.] Purposely; intentionally; by design or purpose; not ignorantly; not inadvertently; not fortuitously.

Uses made things; that is to say, some things were made designedly, and on purpose, for such an use as they serve to. Ray on the Creation.

The next thing is sometimes designedly to put children in pain; but care must be taken that this be done when the child is in good humour. Locke.

DESI'GNER, dê-sî'nûr.[98] n. s. [from design.]

1. One that designs, intends, or purposes; a purposer.
2. A plotter; a contriver; one that lays schemes.

It has therefore always been both the rule and practice for such designers to suborn the publick interest, to countenance and cover their private. Decay of Piety.

3. One that forms the idea of any thing in painting or sculpture.

There is a great affinity between designing and poetry; for the Latin poets, and the designers of the Roman medals, lived very near one another, and were bred up to the same relish for wit and fancy. Addison.

DESI'GNING, dê-sî'nîng. participial adj. [from design.] Insidious; treacherous; deceitful; fraudulently artful.

'Twould show me poor, indebted, and compell'd,
Designing, mercenary, and I know
You would not wish to think I could be bought. Southern.

DESI'GNLESS, dê-sîne'lês. adj. [from design.] Without intention; without design; unknowing; inadvertent.

DESI'GNLESSLY, dê-sîne'lês-lê. adv. [from designless.] Without intention; ignorantly; inadvertently.

In this great concert of his whole creation, the designlessly conspiring voices are as differing as the conditions of the respective singers. Boyle.

DESI'GNMENT, dê-sîne'mênt. n. s. [from design.]

1. A purpose and intent.

The sanctity of the christian religion excludes fraud and falsehood from the designments, and aims of its first promulgators. Decay of Piety.

'Tis a greater credit to know the ways of captivating nature, and making her subserve our purposes and designments, than to have learned all the intrigues of policy. Glanville.

2. A scheme of hostility.

News, lords! our wars are done!
The desperate tempest hath so bang'd the Turks,
That their designment halts. Shaksp.

She received advice both of the king's desperate estate, and of the duke's designments against her. Hayward.

3. The idea, or sketch of a work.

The scenes which represent cities and countries are not really such, but only painted on board and canvass; but shall that excuse the ill painture or designment of them? Dryden.

When absent, yet we conquer'd in his right;
For though that some mean artist's skill were shown
In mingling colours, or in placing light,
Yet still the fair designment was his own. Dryden.

DESI'RABLE, dê-zî'râ-bl. adj. [from desire.]

1. That is to be wished with earnestness.

Adjudged cases, collected by men of great sagacity, will improve his mind toward acquiring this desirable amplitude and extent of thought. Watts.

He cannot but confess, that it is a thing the most desirable to man, and most agreeable to the goodness of God, that he should send forth his light and his truth by a special revelation of this will. Rogers.

2. Pleasing; delightful.

She then let drop some expressions about an agate snuff-box: I immediately took the hint, and bought one; being unwilling to omit any thing that might make me desirable in her eyes. Addison.

Our own sex, our kindred, our houses, and our very names, seem to have something good and desirable in them. Watts.

DESI'RE, dê-zîre'. n. s. [desir, Fr. deseo, Italian; desiderium, Lat.] Wish; eagerness to obtain or enjoy.

Desire is the uneasiness a man finds in himself upon the absence of any thing, whose present enjoyment carries the idea of delight with it. Locke.

Drink provokes, and unprovokes; it provokes the desire, but it takes away the performance. Shaksp.

Desire's the vast extent of human mind;
It mounts above, and leaves poor hope behind. Dryden.

It is in a man's power only to observe what the ideas are that take their turns in his understanding, or else to direct the sort, and call in such as he hath a desire or use of. Locke.

To DESI'RE, dê-zîre'. v. a. [desirer, Fr. desiderare, Lat.]

1. To wish; to long for; to covet.

Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold. Deut.

Jove beheld it with a desiring look. Dryden.

3. To ask; to intreat.

Sir, I intreat you home with me to dinner.
—I humbly do desire your grace of pardon;
I must away this night. Shakspeare.

But since you take such int'rest in our woe,
And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell
What in our last and fatal night befel. Dryden.

4. To require; to demand. Not in use.

A doleful case desires a doleful song,
Without vain arts or curious compliments. Spenser.

DESI'RER, dê-zî'rûr.[98] n. s. [from desire.] One that is eager of any thing; a wisher.

I will counterfeit the bewitchment of some popular man, and give it bountifully to the desirers. Shakspeare.

DESI'ROUS, dê-zî'rûs.[314] adj. [from desire.] Full of desire; eager; longing after; wishing for.

The same piety which maketh them that are in authority desirous to please and resemble God by justice, inflameth every way men of action with zeal to do good. Hooker.

Be not desirous of his dainties; for they are deceitful meat. Proverbs.

Men are drowsy and desirous to sleep before the fit of an ague, and yawn and stretch. Bacon.

Adam the while,
Waiting desirous her return, had wove
Of choicest flow'rs a garland. Milton.

Conjugal affection,
Prevailing over fear and timorous doubt,
Hath led me on, desirous to behold
Once more thy face. Milton.

DESI'ROUSLY, dê-zî'rûs-lê. adv. [from desirous.] Eagerly; with desire; with ardent wishes.

DESI'ROUSNESS, dê-zî'rûs-nês. n. s. [from desirous.] Fulness of desire, eagerness. Dict.

To DESI'ST, dê-sîst'.[447] v. n. [desisto, Latin.] To cease from any thing; to stop: with from.

Desist, thou art discern'd,
And toil'st in vain: nor me in vain molest. Milton.

There are many who will not quit a project, though they find it pernicious or absurd; but will readily desist from it, when they are convinced it is impracticable. Addison.

DESI'STANCE, dê-sîs'tânse. n. s. [from desist.] The act of desisting; cessation.

Men usually give freeliest where they have not given before; and make it both the motive and excuse of their desistance from giving any more, that they have given already. Boyle.

DESI'TIVE, dê-sî'tîv. adj. [desitus, Latin.] Ending; concludent; final.

Inceptive and desitive propositions are of this sort: the fogs vanish as the sun rises; but the fogs have not yet begun to vanish, therefore the sun is not yet risen. Watts.

DESK, dêsk. n. s. [disch, a table, Dutch.] An inclining table for the use of writers or readers, made commonly with a box or repository under it.

Tell her, in the desk,
That's cover'd o'er with Turkish tapestry,
There is a purse of ducats. Shakspeare.

He is drawn leaning on a desk, with his bible before him. Walton's Angler.

I have been obliged to leave unfinish'd in my desk the heads of two essays. Pope.

Not the desk with silver nails,
Nor bureau of expence,
Nor standish well japann'd, avails
To writing of good sense. Swift.

DE'SOLATE, dês'sô-lâte.[91] adj. [desolatus, Latin.]

1. Without inhabitants; uninhabited.

Let us seek some desolate shade, and there
Weep our sad bosoms empty. Shakspeare.

This hero appears at first in a desolate island, sitting upon the side of the sea. Broome.

2. Deprived of inhabitants; laid waste.

This city will be desolate, without an inhabitant. Jer.

3. Solitary; without society.

To DE'SOLATE, dês'sô-lâte. v. a. [desolo, Lat.] To deprive of inhabitants; to lay waste; to make desert.

Thick around
Thunders the sport of those, who with the gun
And dog impatient bounding at the shot,
Worse than the season desolate the fields. Thomson.

DE'SOLATELY, dês'sô-lâte-lê. adv. [from desolate.] In a desolate manner.

DESOLA'TION, dês-sô-lâ'shûn. n. s. [from desolate.]

1. Destruction of inhabitants; reduction to solitude.

What with your praises of the country, what with your discourse of the lamentable desolation thereof made by those Scots, you have filled me with a great compassion. Spenser.

Without her follows to myself and thee,
Herself, the land, and many a christian soul,
Death, desolation, ruin, and decay. Shakspeare.

2. Gloominess; sadness; melancholy; destitution.

That dwelling-place is unnatural to mankind; and then the terribleness of the continual motion, the desolation of the far being from comfort, the eye and the ear having ugly images before it, doth still vex the mind, even when it is best armed against it. Sidney.

Then your hose shall be ungartered, and every thing about you demonstrate a careless desolation. Shakspeare.

My desolation does begin to make
A better life. Shakspeare.

To complete
The scene of desolation, stretch'd around
The grim guards stand. Thomson.

3. A place wasted and forsaken.

How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations! Jer.

DESPA'IR, dê-spâre'. n. s. [desespoir, French.]

1. Hopelessness; despondence; loss of hope.

Despair is the thought of the unattainableness of any good, which works differently in men's minds; sometimes producing uneasiness or pain, sometimes rest and indolency. Locke.

You had either never attempted this change, set on with hope; or never discovered it, stopt with despair. Sidney.

We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair. 2 Cor.

Wearied, forsaken, and pursued at last,
All safety in despair of safety plac'd,
Courage he thence resumes, resolv'd to bear
All their assaults, since 'tis in vain to fear. Denham.

Equal their flame, unequal was their care:
One lov'd with hope, one languish'd with despair. Dryden.

2. That which causes despair; that of which there is no hope.

Strangely visited people,
All swoln and ulcerous, pitiful to the eye;
The mere despair of surgery, he cures;
Hanging a golden stamp about their necks,
Put on with holy prayers. Shakspeare.

3. [In theology.] Loss of confidence in the mercy of God.

Are not all or most evangelical virtues and graces in danger of extremes? As there is, God knows, too often a defect on the one side, so there may be an excess on the other: may not hope in God, or godly sorrow, be perverted into presumption or despair. Sprat.

To DESPA'IR, dê-spâre'. v. n. [despero, Latin.] To be without hope; to despond: with of before a noun.

Though thou drewest a sword at thy friend yet despair not; for there may be a turning. Ecclus.

We commend the wit of the Chinese, who despair of making of gold, but are mad upon making of silver. Bacon.

Never despair of God's blessings here, or of his reward hereafter; but go on as you have begun. Wake.

DESPA'IRER, dê-spâre'ûr. n. s. [from despair.] One without hope.

He cheers the fearful, and commends the bold,
And makes despairers hope for good success. Dryd.

DESPA'IRFUL, dê-spâre'fûl. adj. [despair and full.] Hopeless. Obsolete.

That sweet but sour despairful care. Sidney.

Other cries among the Irish savour of the Scythian barbarism; as the lamentations of their burials, with despairful outcries. Spenser.

DESPA'IRINGLY, dê-spâ'rîng-le. adv. [from despairing.] In a manner betokening hopelessness or despondency.

He speaks severely and despairingly of our society. Boyle.

To DESPA'TCH, dê-spâtch'. v. a. [depecher, Fr.]

1. To send away hastily.

Doctor Theodore Coleby, a sober man, I despatched immediately to Utrecht, to bring the moxa, and learn the exact method of using it. Temple.

The good Æneas, whose paternal care
Iulus' absence could no longer bear,
Despatch'd Achates to the ships in haste,
To give a glad relation of the past. Dryden.

2. To send out of the world; to put to death.

Edmund, I think, is gone,
In pity of his misery, to despatch
His knighted life. Shakspeare.

And the company shall stone them with stones, and despatch them with their swords. Ezek.

In combating, but two of you will fall;
And we resolve we will despatch you all. Dryden.

Despatch me quickly, I may death forgive;
I shall grow tender else, and wish to live. Dryden.

3. To perform a business quickly: as I despatched my affairs, and ran hither.

Therefore commanded he his chariot-man to drive without ceasing, and to despatch the journey, the judgment of God now following him. 2 Mac.

No sooner is one action despatched, which, by such a determination as the will, we are set upon, but another uneasiness is ready to set us on work. Locke.

4. To conclude an affair with another.

What, are the brothers parted?
—They have despatch'd with Pompey; he is gone. Shakspeare.

DESPA'TCH, dê-spâtsh'. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Hasty execution; speedy performance.

Affected despatch is one of the most dangerous things that can be. Bacon.

You'd see, could you her inward motions watch,
Feigning delay, she wishes for despatch;
Then to a woman's meaning would you look,
Then read her backward. Granville.

The despatch of a good office is very often as beneficial to the solicitor as the good office itself. Addison.

2. Conduct; management. Obsolete.

You shall put
This night's great business into my despatch,
Which shall, to all our nights and days to come,
Give solely sovereign sway and masterdom. Shaksp.

3. Express; hasty messenger or message: as, despatches were sent away.

DESPA'TCHFUL, dê-spâtsh'fûl. adj. [from despatch.] Bent on haste; intent on speedy execution of business.

So saying, with despatchful looks in haste
She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent. Milton.

Let one despatchful bid some swain to lead

DE'SPERATE, dês'pê-râte.[91] adj. [desperatus, Latin.]

1. Without hope.

Since his exile she hath despis'd me most;
Forsworn my company, and rail'd at me,
That I am desperate of obtaining her. Shakspeare.

2. Without care of safety; rash; precipitant; fearless of danger.

Can you think, my lords,
That any Englishman dare give me counsel,
Or be a known friend 'gainst his highness' pleasure,
Though he be grown so desperate to be honest,
And live a subject? Shakspeare.

He who goes on without any care or thought of reforming, such an one we vulgarly call a desperate person, and that sure is a most damning sin. Hammond.

3. Irretrievable; unsurmountable; irrecoverable.

These debts may be well called desperate ones; for a mad man owes them. Shakspeare.

In a part of Asia the sick, when their case comes to be thought desperate, are carried out and laid on the earth, before they are dead, and left there. Locke.

I am a man of desperate fortunes, that is, a man whose friends are dead; for I never aimed at any other fortune than in friends. Pope to Swift.

4. Mad; hot-brained; furious.

Were it not the part of a desperate physician to wish his friend dead, rather than to apply the best endeavours of his skill for his recovery? Spenser.

5. It is sometimes used in a sense nearly ludicrous, and only marks any bad quality predominating in a high degree.

Concluding all mere desp'rate sots and fools,
That durst depart from Aristotle's rules. Pope.

DE'SPERATELY, dês'pê-râte-lê. adv. [from desperate.]

1. Furiously; madly; without attention to safety or danger.

Your eldest daughters have foredone themselves,
And desp'rately are dead. Shakspeare.

There might be somewhat in it, that he would not have done, or desired undone, when he broke forth as desperately as before he had done uncivilly. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

2. In a great degree; violently: this sense is ridicrous.

She fell desperately in love with him, and took a voyage into Sicily in pursuit of him. Addison.

DE'SPERATENESS, dês'pê-râte-nês. n. s. [from desperate.] Madness; fury; precipitance.

The going on not only in terrours and amazement of conscience, but also boldly, hopingly, confidently, in wilful habits of sin, is called a desperateness also; and the more bold thus, the more desperate. Hammond.

DESPERA'TION, dês-pê-râ'shûn. n. s. [from desperate.] Hopelessness: despair; despondency.

Desperation
Is all the policy, strength, and defence,
That Rome can make against them. Shakspeare.

As long as we are guilty of any past sin, and have no promise of remission, whatever our future care be, this desperation of success chills all our industry, and we sin on because we have sinned. Hammond.

DE'SPICABLE, dês'pê-kâ-bl. adj. [despicabilis, Lat.] Contemptible; vile; mean; sordid; worthless. It is applied equally to persons or things.

Our case were miserable, if that wherewith we most endeavour to please God were in his sight so vile and despicable as men's disdainful speech would make it. Hooker.

Their heads as low
Bow'd down in battle, sunk before the spears
Of despicable foes. Milton.

All th' earth he gave thee to possess and rule,
No despicable gift. Milton.

Not less ev'n in this despicable hero,
Than when my name shook Africk with affright,
And froze your hearts beneath your torrid zone. Dryden.

All the quiet that could be expected from such a reign, must be the result of absolute power on the one hand and a despicable slavery on the other. Addison.

When men of rank and figure pass away their lives in criminal pursuits and practices, they render themselves more vile and despicable than any innocent man can be, whatever low station his fortune and birth have placed him in. Addison.

DE'SPICABLENESS, dês'pê-kâ-bl-nês. n. s. [from despicable.] Meanness; vileness; worthlessness.

We consider the great disproportion between the infinity of the reward and the despicableness of our service. Decay of Piety.

DE'SPICABLY, dês'pê-kâ-blê. adv. [from despicable.] Meanly; sordidly; vilely.

Here wanton Naples crowns the happy shore,
Nor vainly rich, nor despicably poor;
The town in soft solemnities delights,
And gentle poets to her arms invites. Addison.

DESPI'SABLE, dê-spi'zâ-bl. adj. [from despise.] Contemptible; despicable; regarded with contempt. A word scarcely used but in low conversation.

I am obliged to you for taking notice of a poor old distressed courtier, commonly the most despisable thing in the world. Arbuthnot to Pope.

To DESPI'SE, dê-spize'. v. a. [despiser, old French, Skinner; despicio, Latin.]

1. To scorn; to contemn; to slight; to disrespect.

My sons their old unhappy sire despise,
Spoil'd of his kingdom, and depriv'd of eyes. Pope.

2. In Shakspeare it seems once to signify abhor, as from the Italian despettare.

Let not your ears despise my tongue for ever,
Which shall possess them with the heaviest sound
That ever yet they heard. Shakspeare.

DESPI'SER, dê-spi'zûr. n. s. [from despise.] Contemner; scorner.

Art thou thus bolden'd, man, by thy distress,
Or else a rude despiser of good manners,
That in civility thou seem'st so empty? Shaksp.

Wisdom is commonly, at long running, justified even of her despisers. Government of the Tongue.

Thus the atheists, libertines, and despisers of religion, usually pass under the name of free-thinkers. Swift.

DESPITE, dê-spite'. n. s. [spijt, Dutch; dépit, French.]

1. Malice; anger; malignity; maliciousness; spleen; hatred.

Thou wretch! despite o'erwhelm thee! Shaksp.

With men these considerations are usually the causes of despite, disdain, or aversion from others; but with God they pass for reasons of our greater tenderness towards others. Sprat.

2. Defiance; unsubdued opposition.

The life, thou gavest me first, was lost and done;
Till with thy warlike sword, despite of fate,
To my determin'd time thou gav'st new date. Shakspeare.

My life thou shalt command, but not my shame:
The one my duty owes; but my fair name,
Despite of death, that lives upon my grave,
To dark dishonour's use thou shalt not have. Shaks.

Know I will serve the fair in thy despite. Dryden.

I have not quitted yet a victor's right;
I'll make you happy in your own despite. Dryden.

Say, would the tender creature, in despite
Of heat by day, and chilling dews by night,
Its life maintain? Blackmore.

Thou, with rebel insolence, didst dare
To own and to protect that hoary ruffian;
And, in despite ev'n of thy father's justice,
To stir the factious rabble up to arms. Rowe.

3. Act of malice; act of opposition.

His punishment, eternal misery,
It would be all his solace and revenge,
As a despite done against the Most High,
Thee once to gain companion of his woe. Milton.

To DESPI'TE, dê-spite'. v. a. [from the noun.] To vex; to offend; to disappoint; to give uneasiness to.

Saturn, with his wife Rhea, fled by night; setting the town on fire, to despite Bacchus. Raleigh.

DESPI'TEFUL, dê-spite'fûl. adj. [despite and full.] Malicious; full of spleen; full of hate; malignant; mischievous: used both of persons and things.

I, his despiteful Juno, sent him forth
From courtly friends with camping foes to live,
Where death and danger dog the heels of worth. Shakspeare.

Preserve us from the hands of our despiteful and deadly enemies. King Charles.

Meanwhile the heinous and despiteful act
Of Satan, done in Paradise, was known
In heav'n. Milton.

DESPI'TEFULLY, dê-spite'fûl-lê. adv. [from despiteful.] Maliciously; maliguantly.

Of puissant arms, and laid in easy bed. Spenser.

DESPOLIA'TION, dês-pô-lê-â'shûn.[530] n. s. [from despolio, Lat.] The act of despoiling or stripping.

To DESPO'ND, dê-spônd'. v. a. [despondeo, Lat.]

1. To despair; to lose hope; to become hopeless or desperate.

It is every man's duty to labour in his calling, and not to despond for any miscarriages or disappointments that were not in his own power to prevent. L'Estrange.

There is no surer remedy for superstitious and desponding weakness, than first to govern ourselves by the best improvement of that reason which providence has given us for a guide; and then, when we have done our own parts, to commit all cheerfully, for the rest, to the good pleasure of heaven, with trust and resignation. L'Estrange.

Physick is their bane:
The learned leaches in despair depart,
And shake their heads, desponding of their art. Dryden.

Others depress their own minds, despond at the first difficulty; and conclude, that making any progress in knowledge, farther than serves their ordinary business, is above their capacities. Locke.

2. [In theology.] To lose hope of the divine mercy.

He considers what is the natural tendency of such a virtue, or such a vice: he is well apprized that the representation of some of these things may convince the understanding, some may terrify the conscience, some may allure the slothful, and some encourage the desponding mind. Watts.

DESP'NDENCY dê-spôn'dên-sê. n s. [from despondent.] Despair; hopelessness; d speration.

DESPO'NDENT, dê-spôn'dênt. adj. [despondens, Lat.] Despairing; hopeless; without hope.

It is well known, both from ancient and modern experience, that the very boldest atheists, out of their debauches and company, when they chance to be surprised with solitude or sickness, are the most suspicious, timorous, and despondent wretches in the world. Bentley.

Congregated thrushes, linnets, sit
On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock. Thomson.

To DESPO'NSATE, dê-spôn'sâte. v. a. [desponso, Lat.] To betroth; to affiance; to unite by reciprocal promises of marriage.

DE'STINY, dês'tê-nê. n. s. [destinée, Fr.]

1. The power that spins the life, and determines the fate, of living beings.

Thou art neither like thy sire or dam;
But, like a foul mishapen stigmatick,
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided. Shaksp.

2. Fate; invincible necessity.

He said, dear daughter, rightly may I rue
The fall of famous children born of me;
But who can turn the stream of destiny,
Or break the chain of strong necessity,
Which fast is tied to Jove's eternal seat? F. Queen.
How can hearts, not free, be tried whether they serve
Willing or no, who will but what they must
By destiny, and can no other chuse? Milton.
Had thy great destiny but given thee skill
To know, as well as pow'r to act, her will. Denham.
Chance, or forceful destiny,
Which forms in causes first whate'er shall be. Dryden.

3. Doom; condition in future time.

At the pit of Acheron
Meet me i' th' morning; thither he
Will come to know his destiny. Shakspeare.

DE'STITUTE, dês'tê-tûte. adj. [destitutus, Lat.]

1. Forsaken; abandoned: with of.

To forsake the true God of heaven, is to fall into all such evils upon the face of the earth, as men, either destitute of grace divine, may commit, or unprotected from above, may endure. Hooker.

2. Abject; friendless.

He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. Psalms.

3. In want of.

Take the destin'd way
To find the regions destitute of day. Dryden.

Nothing can be a greater instance of the love that mankind has for liberty, than such a savage mountain covered with people, and the Campania of Rome, which lies in the same country, destitute of inhabitants. Addison.

DESTITU'TION, dês-tê-tû'shûn. n. s. [from destitute.] Want; the state in which something is wanted: applied to persons.

That destitution in food and cloathing is such an impediment, as, till it be removed, suffereth not the mind of man to admit any other care. Hooker.

They which want furtherance unto knowledge, are not left in so great destitution, that justly any man should think the ordinary means of eternal life taken from them. Hooker.

The order of paying the debts of contract or restitution is set down by the civil laws of a kingdom: in destitution or want of such rules, we are to observe the necessity of the creditor, the time of the delay, and the special obligations of friendship. Taylor.

To DESTRO'Y, dê-strôê'. v. a. [destruo, Lat. destruire, Fr.]

1. To overturn a city; to raze a building to ruin.

The Lord will destroy this city. Genesis.

2. To lay waste; to make desolate.

Solyman sent his army, which burnt and destroyed the country villages. Knolles.

3. To kill.

A people, great and many, and tall as the Anakims; but the Lord destroyed them before them, and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead. Deuteronomy.

'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
Than by destruction dwell in doubtful joy. Shaksp.

The wise Providence hath placed a certain antipathy between some animals and many insects, whereby they delight in their destruction, though they use them not as food; as the peacock destroys snakes and adders; the weasel, mice, and rats; spiders, flies; and some sorts of flies destroy spiders. Hale.

4. To put an end to; to bring to nought.

Do we not see that slothful, intemperate, and incontinent persons destroy their bodies with diseases, their reputations with disgrace, and their faculties with want? Bentley.

There will be as many sovereigns as fathers; the mother too hath her title, which destroys the sovereignty of one supreme monarch. Locke.

DESTRO'YER, dê-strôê'ûr.[98] n. s. [from destroy.] The person that destroys or lays waste; a murderer.

It is said that Assur both founded it and ruined it; it may be understood, that Assur the founder was the son of Shem, and Assur the destroyer was an Assyrian. Raleigh.

Triumph, to be styl'd great conquerors,
Patrons of mankind, gods, and sons of gods!
Destroyers rightlier call'd, and slayers of men. Milton.

Yet, guiltless too, this bright destroyer lives;
At random wounds, nor knows the wound she gives. Pope.

DESTRU'CTIBLE, dê-strûc'tê-bl. adj. [from destruo, Lat.] Liable to destruction.

DESTRUCTIBI'LITY, dê-strûc-tê-bil'ê-tê. n. s. [from destructible.] Liableness to destruction.

DESTRU'CTION, dê-strûk'shûn. n. s. [destructio, Lat.]

1. The act of destroying; subversion; demolition.

2. Murder; massacre.

'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
Than by destruction dwell in doubtful joy. Shaksp.

3. The state of being destroyed; ruin; murder suffered.

If that your moody discontented souls
Do through the clouds behold this present hour,
Even for revenge mock my destruction. Shakspeare.
When that which we immortal thought
We saw so near destruction brought,
We felt what you did then endure,
And tremble yet, as not secure. Waller.

4. The cause of destruction; a destroyer; a depopulator: as a consuming plague.

The destruction that wasteth at noon day. Psalms.

5. [In theology.] Eternal death.

Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction. Matthew.

DESTRU'CTIVE, dê-strŭk'tĭv. adj. [destructivus, low Lat.]

1. That has the quality of destroying; wasteful; causing ruin and devastation; that brings to destruction.

In ports and roads remote,
Destructive fires among whole fleets we send. Dryd.

One may think that the continuation of existence, with a kind of resistance to any destructive force, is the continuation of solidity. Locke.

2. With of.

He will put an end to so absurd a practice, which makes our most refined diversions destructive of all politeness. Addison.

Both are defects equally destructive of true religion. Rogers.

3. With to.

In a firm building, even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength. Dryden.

Excess of cold, as well as heat, pains us: because it is equally destructive to that temper which is necessary to the preservation of life. Locke.

DESTRU'CTIVELY, dê-strŭk'tĭv-lê. adv. [from destructive.] Ruinously; mischievously; with power to destroy.

What remains but to breath out Moses's wish? O that men were not so destructively foolish! Decay of Piety.

DESTRU'CTIVENESS, dê-strŭk'tĭv-nês. n. s. [from destructive.] The quality of destroying or ruining.

The vice of professors exceeds the destructiveness of the most hostile assaults, as intestine treachery is more ruinous than foreign violence. Decay of Piety.

DESTRU'CTOR, dê-strŭk'tŭr.[166] n. s. [from destroy.] Destroyer; consumer.

Helmont wittily calls the fire the destructor and the artificial death of things. Boyle.

DESUDA'TION, dês-ù-dà'shŭn. n. s. [desudatio, Lat.] A profuse and inordinate sweating, from what cause soever.

DE'SUETUDE, dês'swê-tûde.[334] n. s. [desuetudo, Lat.] Cessation from being accustomed; discontinuance of practice or habit.

By the eruption of numerous armies of barbarous people, those countries were quickly fallen off, with barbarism and desuetude, from their former civility and knowledge. Hale.

We see in all things how desuetude does contract and narrow our faculties, so that we can apprehend only those things wherein we are conversant. Government of the Tongue.

DE'SULTORY, dês'ŭl-tŭr-ê.[512] } adj.
DESULTO'RIOUS, dês-ŭl-tŏ'rê-ŭs. }

[desultorius, Lat.] Roving from thing to thing; unsettled; immethodical; unconstant. Desultorious is not in use.

'Tis not for a desultory thought to atone for a lewd course of life; nor for any thing but the superinducing of a virtuous habit upon a vicious one, to qualify an effectual conversion. L'Estrange.

Let but the least trifle cross his way, and his desultorious fancy presently takes the scent, leaves the unfinish'd and half-mangled notion, and skips away in pursuit of the new game. Norris.

Take my desultory thoughts in their native order, as they rise in my mind, without being reduced to rules, and marshalled according to art. Felton.

To DESU'ME, dê-sûme'. v. a. [desumo, Lat.] To take from any thing; to borrow.

This pebble doth suppose, as pre-existent to it, the more simple matter out of which it is desumed, the heat and influence of the sun, and the due preparation of the matter. Hale.

They have left us relation suitable to those of Ælian and Pliny, whence they desumed their narrations. Brown.

Laws, if convenient and useful, are never the worse though they be desumed and taken from the laws of other countries. Hale.

To DETA'CH, dê-tătsh'. v. a. [detacher, Fr.]

1. To separate; to disengage; to part from something.

The heat takes along with it a sort of vegetative and terrestrial matter, which it detaches from the uppermost stratum. Woodward.

The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again one cannot tell how. Pope.

2. To send out part of a greater body of men on an expedition.

If ten men are in war with forty, and the latter detach only an equal number to the engagement, what benefit do they receive from their superiority? Addison.

DETA'CHMENT, dê-tătsh'mĕnt. n. s. [from detach.] A body of troops sent out from the main army.

The czar dispatched instructions to send out detachments of his cavalry, to prevent the king of Sweden's joining his army. Tatler.

Besides materials, which are brute and blind,
Did not this work require a knowing mind,
Who for the task should fit detachments chuse
From all the atoms? Blackmore.

To DETA'IL, dê-tâle'. v. a. [detailler, Fr.] To relate particularly; to particularize; to display minutely and distinctly.

They will perceive the mistakes of these philosophers, and be able to answer their arguments, without my being obliged to detail them. Cheyne.

DETA'IL, dê-tâle'. n. s. [detail, Fr.] A minute and particular account.

I chuse, rather than trouble the reader with a detail here, to defer them to their proper place. Woodward.

I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail, without becoming dry and tedious. Pope.

To DETA'IN, dê-tâne'. v. a. [detineo, Lat.]

1. To keep what belongs to another.

Detain not the wages of the hireling: for every degree of detention of it, beyond the time, is injustice and uncharitableness. Taylor.

2. To withhold; to keep back.

These doings sting him
So venomously, that burning shame detains him
From his Cordelia. Shakspeare.

He has described the passion of Calypso, and the indecent advances she made to detain him from his country. Broome.

3. To restrain from departure.

Let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid. Judges.

Had Orpheus sung it in the nether sphere,
So much the hymn had pleas'd the tyrant's ear,
The wife had been detain'd to keep her husband there. Dryden.

4. To hold in custody.

DETA'INDER, dê-tâne'dŭr.[98] n. s. [from detain.] The name of a writ for holding one in custody.

DETA'INER, dê-tâ'nŭr. n. s. [from detain.] He that holds back any one's right; he that detains any thing.

Judge of the obligation that lies upon all sorts of injurious persons; the sacrilegious, the detainers of tithes, and cheaters of men's inheritances. Taylor.

To DETE'CT, dê-tĕkt'. v. a. [detectus, Lat.]

1. To discover; to find out any crime or artifice.

There 's no true lover in the forest; else sighing every minute, and groaning every hour, would detect the lazy foot of time as well as a clock. Shakspeare.

Though should I hold my peace, yet thou
Wouldst easily detect what I conceal. Milton.

2. To discover in general.

The utmost infinite ramifications and inosculations of all the several sorts of vessels may easily be detected by glasses. Ray.

DETE'CTER, dê-tĕk'tŭr. n. s. [from detect.] A discoverer; one that finds out what another desires to hide.

Oh, heavens! that this treason were not; or not I the detector. Shakspeare.

Hypocrisy has a secret hatred of its detector; that which will bring it to a test which it cannot pass. Decay of Piety.

DETE'CTION, dê-tĕk'shŭn. n. s. [from detect.]

1. Discovery of guilt or fraud, or any other fault.

Should I come to her with any detection in my hand, I could drive her then from the ward of her purity. Shakspeare.

That is a sign of the true evangelical zeal, and note for the detection of its contrary: it should abound more in the mild and good-natured affections, than in the vehement and wrathful passions. Sprat.

Detection of the incoherence of loose discourses was wholly owing to the syllogistical form. Locke.

2. Discovery of any thing hidden.

Not only the sea, but rivers and rains also, are instrumental to the detection of amber and other fossils, by washing away the earth and dirt that concealed them. Woodward.

DETE'NTION, dê-tĕn'shŭn. n. s. [from detain.]

1. The act of keeping what belongs to another.

How goes the world, that I am thus encounter'd
With clam'rous claims of debt, of broken bonds,
And the detention of long since due debts,
Against my honour? Shaksp.

2. Confinement; restraint.

This worketh by detention of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts. Bacon.

To DETE'R, dê-tĕr'. v. a. [deterreo, Lat.] To discourage by terrour; to fright from any thing.

I never yet the tragick strain assay'd,
Deterr'd by thy inimitable maid. Waller.

Many and potent enemies tempt and deter us from our duty; yet our case is not hard, so long as we have a greater strength on our side. Tillotson.

Beauty or unbecomingness are of more force to draw or deter imitation, than any discourses which can be made to them. Locke.

The ladies may not be deterred from corresponding with me by this method. Addison.

My own face deters me from my glass;
And Kneller only shews what Celia was. Prior.

To DETER'GE, dê-tĕrge. v. a. [detergo, Lat.] To cleanse a sore; to purge any part from feculence or obstructions.

Consider the part and habit of body, and add or diminish your simples as you design to deterge or incarn. Wiseman.

Sea salt preserves bodies, through which it passeth from corruption; and it detergeth the vessels, and keeps the fluids from putrefaction. Arbuthnot.

DETE'RGENT, dê-tĕr'jĕnt. adj. [from deterge.] That has the power of cleansing.

The food ought to be nourishing and detergent. Arbuthnot.

DETE'RMENT, dè-têr'mênt. n. s. [from deter.] Cause of discouragement; that by which one is deterred. A good word, but not now used.

This will not be thought a discouragement unto spirits which endeavour to advantage nature by art; nor will the ill success of some be made a sufficient determent unto others. Brown.

These are not all the determents that oppose my obeying you. Boyle.

DETE'RMINABLE, dè-têr'mè-nâ-bl. adj. [from determine.] That may be certainly decided.

Whether all plants have seeds, were more easily determinable, if we could conclude concerning hart's-tongue, ferne, and some others. Brown.

About this matter, which seems so easily determinable by sense, accurate and sober men widely disagree. Boyle.

To DETE'RMINATE, dè-têr'mè-nâte. v. a. [determiner, Fr.] To limit; to fix; to determine; to terminate. Not in use.

The fly-slow hours shall not determinate
The dateless limit of thy dear exile. Shaksp.

DETE'RMINATE, dè-têr'mè-nâte.[91] adj. [determinatus, Lat.]

1. Settled; definite; determined.

Demonstrations in numbers, if they are not more evident and exact than in extension, yet they are more general in their use, and determinate in their application Locke.

To make all the planets move about the sun in circular orbs, there must be given to each, by a determinate impulse, those present particular degrees of velocity which they now have, in proportion to their distances from the sun, and to the quantity of the solar matter. Bentley.

2. Established; settled by rule; positive.

Scriptures are read before the time of divine service; and without either choice or stint appointed by any determinate order. Hooker.

3. Decisive; conclusive.

I' th' progress of this business,
Ere a determinate resolution, he,
I mean the bishop, did require a respite. Shaksp.

4. Fixed: resolute.

Like men disused in a long peace, more determinate to do, than skilful how to do. Sidney.

5. Resolved.

My determinate voyage is mere extravagancy. Shaksp.

DETE'RMINATELY, dè-têr-mè-nâte-lè. adv. [from determinate.]

1. Resolutely; with fixed resolve.

The queen obeyed the king's commandment, full of raging agonies, and determinately bent that she would seek all loving means to win Zelmane. Sidney.

In those errors they are so determinately settled, that they pay unto falsity the whole sum of whatsoever love is owing unto God's truth. Hooker.

2. Certainly; unchangeably.

Think thus with yourselves, that you have not the making of things true or false; but that the truth and existence of things is already fixed and settled, and that the principles of religion are already either determinately true or false, before you think of them. Tillotson.

DETERMINA'TION, dè-têr-mè-nâ'shûn. n. s. [from determinate.]

1. Absolute direction to a certain end.

When we voluntarily waste much of our lives, that remissness can by no means consist with a constant determination of will or desire to the greatest apparent good. Locke.

2. The result of deliberation; conclusion formed; resolution taken.

They have acquainted me with their determination, which is to go home, and to trouble you no more. Shaksp.

The proper acts of the intellect are intellection, deliberation, and determination or decision. Hale.

It is much disputed by divines, concerning the power of man's will to good and evil in the state of innocence; and upon very nice and dangerous precipices stand their determinations on either side. South.

Consult thy judgment, affections, and inclinations, and make thy determination upon every particular; and be always as suspicious of thyself as possible. Calamy.

3. Judicial decision.

He confined the knowledge of governing to justice and lenity, and to the speedy determination of civil and criminal causes. Gulliver.

DETE'RMINATIVE, dè-têr'mè-nâ-tîv. adj. [from determinate.]

1. That uncontrollably directs to a certain end.

That individual action, which is justly punished as sinful in us, cannot proceed from the special influence and determinative power of a just cause. Bramhall.

2. That makes a limitation.

If the term added to make up the complex subject does not necessarily or constantly belong to it, then it is determinative, and limits the subject to a particular part of its extention; as, every pious man shall be happy. Watts.

DETERMINA'TOR, dè-têr-mè-nâ'tûr.[521] n. s. [from determinate.] One who determines.

They have recourse unto the great determinator of virginity, conceptions, fertility, and the inscrutable infirmities of the whole body. Brown.

To DETE'RMINE, dè-têr'mîn.[140] v. a. [determiner, Fr. determino, Lat.]

1. To fix; to settle.

Is it concluded he shall be protector?
—It is determined, not concluded yet;
But so it must be, if the king miscarry. Shaksp.

More particularly to determine the proper season for grammar, I do not see how it can be made a study, but as an introduction to rhetorick. Locke.

2. To conclude; to fix ultimately.

Probability, in the nature of it, supposes that a thing may or may not be so, for any thing that yet appears, or is certainly determined, on the other side. South.

Milton's subject was still greater than Homer's or Virgil's: it does not determine the fate of single persons or nations, but of a whole species. Addison.

Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. Addison.

3. To bound; to confine.

The knowledge of men hitherto hath been determined by the view or sight; so that whatsoever is invisible, either in respect of the fineness of the body itself, or the smallness of the parts, or of the subtilty of the motion, is little enquired. Bacon.

The principium individuationis is existence itself, which determines a being of any sort to a particular time and place, incommunicable to two beings of the same kind. Locke.

No sooner have they climbed that hill, which thus determines their view at a distance, but a new prospect is opened. Atterbury.

4. To adjust; to limit; to define.

He that has settled in his mind determined ideas, with names affixed to them, will be able to discern their differences one from another, which is really distinguishing. Locke.

5. To influence the choice.

You have the captives
Who were the opposites of this day's strife;
We do require them of you, so to use them
As we shall find their merits and our safety
May equally determine. Shaksp.

A man may suspend the act of his choice from being determined for or against the thing proposed, till he has examined it. Locke.

As soon as the studious man's hunger and thirst makes him uneasy, he, whose will was never determined to any pursuit of good cheer, is by the uneasiness of hunger and thirst, presently determined to eating and drinking. Locke.

6. To resolve.

Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David. 1 Samuel.

7. To decide.

I do not ask whether bodies so exist, that the motion of one cannot be without the motion of another: to determine this either way, is to beg the question for or against a vacuum. Locke.

8. To put an end to; to destroy.

Now where is he, that will not stay so long
Till sickness hath determin'd me. Shaksp.

To DETE'RMINE, dè-têr-mîn. v. n.

1. To conclude; to form a final conclusion.

Eve! now expect great tidings, which perhaps
Of us will soon determine, or impose
New laws to be observ'd. Milton.

2. To settle opinion.

It is indifferent to the matter in hand which way the learned shall determine of it. Locke.

3. To end; to come to an end.

They were apprehended, and, after conviction, the danger determined by their deaths. Hayward.

All pleasure springing from a gratified passion, as most of the pleasure of sin does, must needs determine with that passion. South.

4. To make decision.

She soon shall know of us
How honourably and how kindly we Determine for her. Shaksp.

5. To end consequentially.

Revolutions of state, many times, make way for new institutions and forms; and often determine in either setting up some tyranny at home, or bringing in some conquest from abroad. Temple.

6. To resolve concerning any thing.

Now, noble peers, the cause why we are met
Is to determine of the coronation. Shaksp.

1. To derogate; to take away by envy, calumny, or censure, any thing from the reputation of another; with from.

Those were assistants in private, but not trusted to manage the affairs in publick; for that would detract from the honour of the principal ambassador. Bacon.
No envy can detract from this; it will shine in history, and, like swans, grow whiter the longer it endures. Dryden.

2. To take away; to withdraw.

By the largeness of the cornices they hinder both the light within, and likewise detract much from the view of the front without. Wotton.
The multitude of partners does detract nothing from each private share, nor does the publickness of it lessen propriety in it. Boyle.

DETRA'CTER, dê-trâk'tŭr. n. s. [from detract.] One that takes away another's reputation; one that impairs the honour of another injuriously.

I am right glad to be thus satisfied, in that I yet was never able till now to choke the mouth of such detracters with the certain knowledge of their slanderous untruths. Spenser.
Whether we are so entirely sure of their loyalty upon the present foot of government, as you may imagine, their detracters make a question. Swift.
Away the fair detracters went,
And gave by turns their censures vent. Swift.

DETRA'CTION, dê-trâk'shŭn. n. s. [detractio, Latin; detraction, French.]

Detraction, in the native importance of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing; and as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame, rendering him less valued and esteemed by others, which is the final aim of detraction. Ayliffe.
I put myself to thy direction, and
Unspeak mine own detraction; here abjure
The taints and blames I laid upon myself,
For strangers to my nature. Shaksp.
Fame, that her high birth to raise,
Seem'd erst so lavish and profuse,
We may justly now accuse,
Of detraction from her praise. Milton.
If detraction could invite us, discretion surely would contain us from any derogatory intention. Brown.
To put a stop to the insults and detractions of vain men, I resolved to enter into the examination. Woodward.
To consider an author as the subject of obloquy and detraction, we may observe with what pleasure a work is received by the invidious part of mankind, in which a writer falls short of himself. Addison.

DETRA'CTORY, dê-trâk'tŭr-ê.[557] adj. [from detract.] Defamatory by denial of desert; derogatory. Sometimes with to, properly from.

This is not only derogatory unto the wisdom of God, who hath proposed the world unto our knowledge and thereby the notion of himself; but also detractory unto the intellect and sense of man, expressedly disposed for that inquisition. Brown.
In mentioning the joys of heaven, I use the expressions I find less detractory from a theme above our praises. Boyle.
The detractory lye takes from a great man the reputation that justly belongs to him. Arbuthnot.

DETRA'CTRESS, dê-trâk'três. n. s. [from detract.] A censorious woman.

If any shall detract from a lady's character, unless she be absent, the said detractress shall be forthwith ordered to the lowest place of the room. Addison.

DE'TRIMENT, dêt-trê-mênt. n. s. [detrimentum, Lat.] Loss; damage; mischief; diminution; harm.

Difficult it must be for one christian church to abolish that which all had received and held for the space of many ages, and that without any detriment unto religion. Hooker.
I can repair
That detriment, if such it be, to lose
Self-lost. Milton.
If your joint pow'r prevail, th' affairs of hell
No detriment need fear; go, and be strong. Milton.
There often fall out so many things to be done on the sudden, that some of them must of necessity be neglected for that whole year, which is the greatest detriment to this whole mystery. Evelyn's Kalendar.
Let a family burn but a candle a night less than the usual number, and they may take in the Spectator without detriment to their private affairs. Addison.

DETRIME'NTAL, dêt-trê-mên-tâl. adj. [from detriment.] Mischievous; harmful; causing loss.

Among all honorary rewards, which are neither dangerous nor detrimental to the donor, I remember none so remarkable as the titles which are bestowed by the emperor of China: these are never given to any subject till the subject is dead. Addison.
Obstinacy in prejudices, which are detrimental to our country, ought not to be mistaken for virtuous resolution and firmness of mind. Addison.

DETRI'TION, dê-trish'ŭn. n. s. [detero, detritus, Lat.] The act of wearing away. Dict.

To DETRU'DE, dê-trôôd'. v. a. [detrudo, Lat.] To thrust down; to force into a lower place.

Such as are detruded down to hell,
Either for shame they still themselves retire,
Or, tied in chains, they in close prison dwell. Davies.
Philosophers are of opinion, that the souls of men may, for their miscarriages, be detruded into the bodies of beasts. Locke.
At thy command the vernal sun awakes
The torpid sap, detruded to the root
By wintry winds. Thomson.

To DETRU'NCATE, dê-trŭng'kâte. v. a. [detrunco, Lat.] To lop; to cut; to shorten by deprivation of parts.

DETRUNCA'TION, dêt-rŭn-kâ'shŭn. n. s. [from detruncate.] The act of lopping or cutting.

DETRU'SION, dê-trôô'zhŭn. n. s. [from detrusio, Lat.] The act of thrusting or forcing down.

From this detrusion of the waters towards the side, the parts towards the pole must be much increased. Keil against Burnet.

DETURBA'TION, dê-tŭr-bâ'shŭn. n. s. [deturbo, Lat.] The act of throwing down; degradation. Dict.

DEVASTA'TION, dêv-âs-tâ'shŭn. n. s. [devasto, Lat.] Waste; havock; desolation; destruction.

By devastation the rough warrior gains,
And farmers fatten most when famine reigns. Garth.
That flood which overflowed Attica in the days of Ogyges, and that which drowned Thessaly in Deucalion's time, made cruel havock and devastation among them. Woodward.

DEUCE, dûse. n. s. [deux, French.]

1. Two: a word used in games.

You are a gentleman and a gamester; then, I am sure, you know how much the gross sum of deuce ace amounts to. Shaksp.

2. The devil. See DEUSE.

To DEVE'LOP, dê-vêl'ûp. v. a. [developer, French.] To disengage from something that enfolds and conceals; to disentangle; to clear from its covering.

1. To strip; to deprive of clothes,

Friends all but now,
In quarter and in terms like bride and groom
Devesting them for bed. Shaksp.
Then of his arms Androgeus he devests,
His sword, his shield, he takes, and plumed crests.
Denham.

2. To annul; to take away any thing good.

What are those breaches of the law of nature and nations, which do forfeit and devest all right and title in a nation to government? Bacon.

3. To free from any thing bad.

Come on, thou little inmate of this breast,
Which for thy sake from passions I devest. Prior.

DEVE'X, dê-vêks'. adj. [devexus, Lat.] Bending down; declivous; incurvated downward.

DEVE'XITY, dê-vêk'sê-tê. n. s. [from devex.] Incurvation downward; declivity.

To DE'VIATE, dê'vê-âte.[542] v. n. [de via decedere, Lat.]

1. To wander from the right or common way.

The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense. Dryden.
Thus Pegasus, a nearer way to take,
May boldly deviate from the common track.
Pope.
What makes all physical and moral ill?
There nature deviates, and here wanders will.
Pope.
Besides places which may deviate from the sense of the author, it would be kind to observe any deficiencies in the diction. Pope.

2. To go astray; to err; to sin; to offend.

DEVIA'TION, dê-vê-â-shûn. n. s. [from deviate.]

1. The act of quitting the right way; errour; wandering.

These bodies constantly move round in the same tracks, without making the least deviation. Cheyne.

2. Variation from established rule.

Having once surveyed the true and proper natural alphabet, we may easily discover the deviations from it, in all the alphabets in use, either by defect of single characters, or letters, or by confusion of them. Holder.

3. Offence; obliquity of conduct.

Worthy persons, if inadvertently drawn into a deviation, will endeavour instantly to recover their lost ground, that they may not bring errour into habit. Clarissa.

DEVI'CE, dê-vice'. n. s. [devise, French; devisa, Italian.]

1. A contrivance; a stratagem.

This is our device,
That Falstaff at that oak shall meet with us.
Shaksp.
He intended it as a politick device to lessen their interest, and keep them low in the world. Atterbury.

2. A design; a scheme formed; project; speculation.

Touching the exchange of laws in practice with laws in device, which they say are better for the state of the church, if they might take place; the farther we examine them, the greater cause we find to conclude, although we continue the same we are, the harm is not great. Hooker.
His device is against Babylon, to destroy it. Jeremiah.
There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord shall stand. Proverbs.

3. The emblem on a shield; the ensign armorial of a nation or family.

Then change we shields, and their devices bear;
Let fraud supply the want of force in war. Dryd.
Hibernia's harp, device of her command,
And parent of her mirth, shall there be seen.
Prior.
They intend to let the world see what party they are of, by figures and designs upon these fans; as the knights-errant used to distinguish themselves by devices on their shields. Addison.

4. Invention; genius.

He's gentle, never schooled, and yet learned; full of noble device, of all sorts enchantingly beloved. Shaksp.

DE'VIL, dêv'vl.[154] n. s. [ᵭiopul, Saxon; diabolus, Lat.] It were more properly written divel.]

1. A fallen angel; the tempter and spiritual enemy of mankind.

Are you a man?
——Ay, and a bold one, that dare look on that
Which might appal the devil. Shaksp.

2. A wicked man or woman.

See thyself, devil:
Proper deformity seems not in the fiend
So horrid as in woman. Shaksp.

3. A ludicrous term for mischief.

A war of profit mitigates the evil;
But to be tax'd, and beaten, is the devil. Granville.

4. A kind of expletive, expressing wonder or vexation.

The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare;
But wonder how the devil they got there! Pope.

5. A kind of ludicrous negative in an adverbial sense.

The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.
A Proverb.

DE'VILISH, dêv'vl-ish. adj. [from devil.]

1. Partaking of the qualities of the devil; diabolical; mischievous; malicious; destructive.

Gynecia mistrusted greatly Cecropia, because she had heard much of the devilish wickedness of her heart. Sidney.
For grief thereof, and devilish despight,
From his infernal furnace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmed all the heaven's light,
Enroll'd in duskish smoke and brimstone blue.
Spenser.
He trains his devilish engin'ry, impal'd
On ev'ry side with shadowy squadrons deep.
Milton.

2. Having communication with the devil.

The dutchess, by his subornation,
Upon my life began her devilish practices. Shak.

3. An epithet of abhorrence or contempt.

A devilish knave! besides the knave is handsome, young, and blyth: all those requisites are in him that delight. Shaksp.

4. Excessive: in a ludicrous sense.

Thy hair and beard are of a different dye,
Short of a foot, distorted of an eye;
With all these tokens of a knave complete,
If thou art honest, thou'rt a devilish cheat. Addis.

DE'VILISHLY, dêv'vl-ish-lê. adv. [from devilish.] In a manner suiting the devil; diabolically.

Those trumpeters threatened them with continual alarms of damnation, if they did not venture life, fortune, and all, in that which wickedly and devilishly those impostures called the cause of God. South.

1. To contrive; to form by art; to invent; to excogitate, to strike out by thought.

Whether they, at their first coming into the land, or afterwards, by trading with other nations which had letters, learned them of them, or devised them among themselves, is very doubtful. Spenser.
He could by his skill draw after him the weight of five thousand bushels of grain, and devise those rare engines which shot small stones at hand, but great ones afar off. Peacham.
Ye sons of art, one curious piece devise,
From whose constructure motion shall arise.
Blackmore.

2. To plan; to scheme.

Behold I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you. Jeremiah.

To DEVI'SE, dê-vize'. v. n. To consider; to contrive; to lay plans; to form schemes: anciently with of.

Her merry fit she freshly 'gan to rear,
And did of joy and jollity devise,
Herself to cherish and her guest to chear. Fairy Q.
But sith now safe ye seized have the shore,
And well arrived are, high God be blest,
Let us devise of ease and everlasting rest.
Fairy Queen.
Since we are so far entered, let us, I pray you, a little devise of those evils by which that country is held in this wretched case, that it cannot, as you say, be recured. Spenser's Ireland.
Devise but how you'll use him when he comes,
and let us two devise to bring him thither.
Shakspeare.

DEVI'SE, dê-vize'. n. s. [devise, a will, old Fr.]

1. The act of giving or bequeathing by will.

This word is properly attributed, in our common law, to him that bequeaths his goods by his last will or testament in writing; and the reason is, because those that now appertain only to the devisour, by this act are distributed into many parts. Cowell.

The alienation is made by devise in a last will only, and a third part of these profits is there demandable. Locke.

2. Contrivance. See DEVICE.

God hath omitted nothing needful to his purpose, nor left his intention to be accomplished by our devises. Hooker.

To DEVI'SE, dê-vîze'. v. a. [from the noun.] To grant by will. A law term.

DEVISEE', dê-vi-zêê'. n. s. He to whom something is bequeathed by will.

DEVI'SER, dê-vî'zûr. n. s. [from devise.] A contriver; an inventer.

Being divided from truth in themselves, they are yet farther removed by advenient deception; for true it is, if I say they are daily mocked into errour by devisers. Brown.

The authors of useful inventions, the devisers of wholesome laws, as were the philosophers of ancient times, were honoured as the fathers and prophets of their country. Grew.

DEVI'SOUR, dê-vî'zûr. n. s. He that gives by will. See DEVISE.

DE'VITABLE, dêv'ê-tâ-bl. adj. [devitabilis, Lat.] Possible to be avoided; avoidable. Dict.

The Romans having once debauched their senses with the pleasures of other nations, they devoted themselves unto all wickedness. Grew.

5. To curse; to execrate; to doom to destruction.

I fly
Those wicked tents devoted; lest the wrath
Impendent, raging into sudden flame,
Distinguish not. Milton.

To destruction sacred and devote,
He with his whole posterity must die. Milton.

Goddess of maids, and conscious of our hearts,
So keep me from the vengeance of thy darts,
Which Niobe's devoted issue felt,
When, hissing through the skies, the feather'd deaths were dealt. Dryden.

Let her, like me, of ev'ry joy forlorn,
Devote the hour when such a wretch was born;
Like me to deserts and to darkness run. Rowe.

DEVO'TE, dê-vôte'. adj. For devoted.

How on a sudden lost,
Defac'd, deflower'd, and now to death devote! Milton.

DEVO'TEDNESS, dê-vô'têd-nês. n. s. [from devote.] The state of being devoted or dedicated; consecration; addictedness.

Whatever may fall from my pen to her disadvantage, relates to her but as she was, or may again be, an obstacle to your devotedness to seraphick love. Boyle.

The owning of our obligation unto virtue, may be styled natural religion; that is to say, a devotedness unto God, so as to act according to his will. Grew.

DEVOTEE', dêv-vô-têê. n. s. [devot, Fr.] One erroneously or superstitiously religious; a bigot.

His waving streamers to the winds displays,
And vows for his return with vain devotion pays. Dryden.

3. An act of external worship.

Religious minds are inflamed with the love of publick devotion. Hooker.

For as I passed by and beheld your devotion, I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God. Acts.

In vain doth man the name of just expect,
If his devotions he to God neglect. Denham.

4. Prayer; expression of devotion.

An aged holy man,
That day and night said his devotion,
No other worldly business did apply. Fairy Queen.

Your devotion has its opportunity: we must pray always, but chiefly at certain times. Sprat.

5. The state of the mind under a strong sense of dependence upon God; devoutness; piety.

Grateful to acknowledge whence his good
Descends, thither with heart, and voice, and eyes
Directed in devotion, to adore
And worship God supreme, who made him chief
Of all his works. Milton.

From the full choir when loud hosannas rise,
And swell the pomp of dreadful sacrifice,
Amid that scene, if some relenting eye
Glance on the stone where our cold reliques lie,
Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heaven,
One human tear shall drop, and be forgiv'n. Pope.

Devotion may be considered either as an exercise of publick or private prayers at set times and occasions, or as a temper of the mind, a state and disposition of the heart, which is rightly affected with such exercises. Law.

6. An act of reverence, respect, or ceremony.

Whither away so fast?
—Upon the like devotion as yourselves,
To gratulate the gentle princes there. Shaksp.

7. Strong affection; ardent love; such as makes the lover the sole property of the person loved.

Be opposite all planets of good luck
To my proceeding, if, with pure heart's love,
Immaculate devotion, holy thoughts,
I tender not thy beauteous princely daughter!
Shakspeare.

He had a particular reverence for the person of the king, and the more extraordinary devotion for that of the prince, as he had had the honour to be trusted with his education. Clarendon.

8. Earnestness; ardour; eagerness.

He seeks their hate with greater devotion than they can render it him; and leaves nothing undone that may fully discover him their opposite. Shaksp.

9. Disposal; power; state of dependance on any one.

Arundel castle would keep that rich corner of the country at his majesty's devotion. Clarendon.

DEVO'TIONAL, dė-vō'shŭn-ăl. adj. [from devotion.] Pertaining to devotion; annexed to worship; religious.

Nor are the soberest of them so apt for that devotional compliance and juncture of hearts, which I desire to bear in holy offices, to be performed with me. King Charles.

The favourable opinion and good word of men comes oftentimes at a very easy rate, by a few demure looks, with some devotional postures and grimaces. South.

DEVO'TIONALIST, dė-vō'shŭn-ăl-ĭst. n. s. [from devotion.] A man zealous without knowledge, or superstitiously devout.

We must be constant and devout in the worship of our God, and ready in all acts of benevolence to our neighbour. Rogers.

2. Filled with pious thoughts.

For this, with soul devout, be thank'd the god;
And, of success secure, return'd to his abode. Dryden.

3. Expressive of devotion or piety.

Anon dry ground appears, and from his ark
The ancient sire descends with all his train;
Then with uplifted hands and eyes devout,
Grateful to heav'n. Milton.

DEVO'UTLY, dė-vōūt'lė. adv. [from devout.] Piously; with ardent devotion; religiously.

Her grace rose, and with modest paces
Came to the altar, where she kneel'd; and saint-like
Cast her fair eyes to heav'n, and pray'd devoutly. Shakspeare.

One of the wise men having a while attentively and devoutly viewed and contemplated this pillar and cross, fell down upon his face. Bacon.

Her twilights were more clear than our mid-day,
She dreamt devoutlier than most use to pray. Donne.

Think, O my soul, devoutly think,
How, with affrighted eyes,
Thou saw'st the wide extended deep
In all its horrors rise. Addison.

To second causes we seem to trust, without expressing, so devoutly as we ought to do, our dependance on the first. Atterbury.

DEUSE, dūse. n. s. [more properly than deuce, Junius, from Dusius, the name of a certain species of evil spirits.] The devil: a ludicrous word.

'Twas the prettiest prologue, as he wrote it;
Well, the deuse take me if I ha'n't forgot it. Congreve.

DEUTERO'GAMY, dū-tĕr-ŏg'ă-mė.[518] n. s. [δεύτερος and γάμος.] A second marriage. Dict.

DEUTERO'NOMY, dū-tĕr-ŏn'ŏ-mė.[518] n. s. [δεύτερος and νομος.] The second book of the law; the fifth book of Moses.

DEUTERO'SCOPY, dū-tĕr-ŏs'kŏ-pė. n. s. [δεύτερος and σκοπέω.] The second intention; the meaning beyond the literal sense. Not in use.

Not attaining the deuteroscopy, or second intention of the words, they are fain to omit their consequences, coherences, figures, or tropologies. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

DEW, dū. n. s. [ᵭeap, Saxon; daaw Dutch.] The moisture upon the ground.

Fogs which we frequently observe after sunsetting, even in our hottest months, are nothing but a vapour consisting of water; which vapour was sent up in greater quantity all the foregoing day, than now in the evening: but the sun then being above the horizon, taking it at the surface of the earth, and rapidly mounting it up into the atmosphere, it was not discernible: the sun being now gone off, the vapour stagnates at and near the earth, and saturates the air till it is so thick as to be easily visible therein: and when at length the heat there is somewhat further spent, which is usually about the middle of the night, it falls down again in a dew, alighting upon herbs and other vegetables, which it cherishes, cools, and refreshes. Woodward.

Never yet one hour in bed
Did I enjoy the golden dew of sleep,
But with his tim'rous dreams was still awak'd. Shakspeare.

That churchman bears a bounteous mind, indeed;
A hand as fruitful as the land that feeds us;
His dew falls ev'ry where. Shakspeare.

She looks as clear
As morning roses newly wash'd with dew. Shaksp.

Dews and rains are but the returns of moist vapours condensed. Bacon.

Now sliding streams the thirsty plants renew,
And feed their fibres with reviving dew. Pope.

To DEW, dū. v. a. [from the noun.] To wet as with dew; to moisten; to bedew.

A trickling stream of balm most sovereign,
And dainty dear, which on the ground still fell,
And overflowed all the fertile plain,
As it had dewed been with timely rain. Fairy Q.

With him pour we in our country's purge
Each drop of us.
——Or so much as it needs
To dew the sovereign flower, and drown the weeds. Shakspeare.

Give me thy hand
That I may dew it with my mournful tears. Shaksp.

He ceas'd; discerning Adam with such joy
Surcharg'd, as had, like grief, been dew'd in tears,
Without the vent of words which these he breath'd. Milton.

Palemon above the rest appears
In sable garments, dew'd with gushing tears. Dryd.

In Gallick blood again
He dews his reeking sword, and strows the ground
With headless ranks. Philips.

DE'WBERRY, dū'bĕr-rė. n. s. [from dew and berry.]

Dewberries, as they stand here among the more delicate fruits, must be understood to mean rasberries, which are also of the bramble kind. Hanmer.

Feed him with apricocks and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries. Shakspeare.

DEWBESPRE'NT, dū-bė-sprĕnt'. part. [dew and besprent.] Sprinkled with dew.

This evening late, by then the chewing flocks
Had ta'en their supper on the savoury herb
Of knot-grass dewbesprent, and were in fold,
I sat me down to watch upon a bank
With ivy canopied, and interwove
With flaunting honey-suckle. Milton.

DEW-BURNING, dū-bŭr'nĭng. adj. [from dew and burning.] The meaning of this compound is doubtful. Perhaps it alludes to the sparkling of dew.

He now, to prove his late renewed might,
High brandishing his bright dew-burning blade,
Upon his crested scalp so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made. Fairy Queen.

DE'WDROP, dū'drŏp. n. s. [dew and drop.] A drop of dew which sparkles at sunrise.

I must go seek some dewdrops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear. Shaksp.

An host
Innumerable as the stars of night,
Or stars of morning, dewdrops which the sun
Impearls on ev'ry leaf, and ev'ry flower. Milton.

Rest, sweet as dewdrops on the flow'ry lawns,
When the sky opens, and the morning dawns! Tickel.

DE'WLAP, dū'lăp. n. s. [from lapping or licking the dew.]

1. The flesh that hangs down from the throat of oxen.

Large rowles of fat about his shoulders flung,
And from his neck the double dewlap hung. Addison.

2. It is used in Shakspeare for a lip flaccid with age, in contempt.

And sometimes lurk I in a gossip's bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab;
And when she drinks against her lips I bob,
And on the wither'd dewlap pour the ale. Shaksp.

DE'WLAPT, dū'lăpt. adj. [from dewlap.] Furnished with dewlaps.

Who would believe that there were mountaineers
Dewlapt like bulls, whose throats had hanging at 'em,
Wallets of flesh? Shakspeare.

The dewlapt bull now chafes along the plain,
While burning love ferments in ev'ry vein. Gay.

DE'W-WORM, dū'wŭrm. n. s. [from dew and worm.] A worm found in dew.

For the trout, the dew-worm, which some call the lob worm, and the brandling, are the chief. Walton.

DE'WY, dū'ė. adj. [from dew.]

1. Resembling dew: partaking of dew.

From the earth a dewy mist
Went up, and water'd all the ground, and each
Plant of the field. Milton.

Where two adverse winds,

Sublim'd from dewy vapours in mid sky,
Engage with horrid shock, the ruffled brine
Roars stormy. Philips.

2. Moist with dew; roscid.

The joyous day 'gan early to appear,
And fair Aurora from her dewy bed
Of aged Tithone 'gan herself to rear,
With rosy cheeks, for shame as blushing red.
Spenser.

The bee with honied thigh,
That at her flow'ry work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring,
With such consort as they keep,
Entice the dewy feather'd sleep. Milton.

His dewy locks distill'd Ambrosia. Milton.

Besides the succour which cold Ancien yields,
The rocks of Hernicus and dewy fields. Dryden.

My mother's blood
Runs on the dexter cheek, and this sinister
Bounds in my sire's. Shakspeare.

DEXTE'RITY, dĕks-tĕr'ĕ-tè. n. s. [dexteritas, Lat.]

1. Readiness of limbs; activity; readiness to attain skill; skill; expertness.

2. Readiness of contrivance; quickness of expedient; skill of management.

His wisdom, by often evading from peril, was turned rather into a dexterity to deliver himself from dangers when they pressed him, than into a providence to prevent and remove them afar off. Bacon.

They attempted to be knaves, but wanted art and dexterity. South.

The same protestants may, by their dexterity, make themselves the national religion, and dispose the church-revenues among their pastors. Swift.

DE'XTEROUS, dĕks'tĕr-ŭs. adj. [dexter, Latin.]

1. Expert at any manual employment; active; ready: as, a dexterous workman.

For both their dext'rous hands the lance could wield. Pope.

2. Expert in management; subtle; full of expedients.

They confine themselves, and are dexterous managers enough of the wares and products of that corner with which they content themselves. Locke.

DE'XTEROUSLY, dĕks'tĕr-ŭs-lè. adv. [from dexterous.] Expertly; skilfully; artfully.

The magistrate sometimes cannot do his own office dexterously, but by acting the minister. South.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dext'rously to throw the lucky sice. Dryden.

As for any tunicles or skins, which should hinder the liver from enabling the dextral parts, we must not conceive it diffuseth its virtue by mere irradiation, but by its veins and proper vessels. Brown.

DEXTRA'LITY, dĕks-trăl'ĕ-tè. n. s. [from dextral.] The state of being on the right, not the left, side.

If there were a determinate prepotency in the right, and such as ariseth from a constant root in nature, we might expect the same in other animals, whose parts are also differenced by dextrality. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

DIABE'TES, dì-ă-bē'tēs. n. s. [διαβάτης.] A morbid copiousness of urine; a fatal colliquation by the urinary passages.

An increase of that secretion may accompany the general colliquations; as in fluxes, hectic sweats and coughs, diabetes, and other consumptions. Derham's Physico-Theology.

DIABO'LICAL, dì-ă-bŏl'ĕ-kăl. } adj. [from
DIABO'LICK, dì-ă-bŏl'ĭk.[609] } diabolus, Latin.] Devilish; partaking of the qualities of the devil; impious; atrocious; nefarious; pertaining to the devil.

This, in other beasts observ'd,
Doubt might beget of diabolick pow'r,
Active within, beyond the sense of brute. Milton.

Does not the ambitious, the envious, and the revengeful man know very well, that the thirst of blood, and affectation of dominion by violence and oppression, is a most diabolical outrage upon the laws of God and nature. L'Estrange.

The practice of lying is a diabolical exercise, and they that use it are the devil's children. Ray.

Damned spirits must needs be all envy, despair, and rage; and have so much of a diabolical nature in them, as to wish all men to share their misery. Atterbury.

DIACO'DIUM, dì-ă-kō'dè-ŭm. n. s. [διακώδιον.] The syrup of poppies.

DIACO'USTICS, dì-ă-kōŭ'stĭks. n. s. [διακουστικὰ.] The doctrine of sounds.

DI'ADEM, dì'ă-dĕm. n. s. [diadema, Latin.]

1. A tiara; an ensign of royalty bound about the head of eastern monarchs.

The sacred diadem in pieces rent,
And purple robe gored with many a wound.
Spenser.

A list the coblers' temples ties,
To keep the hair out of their eyes;
From whence 'tis plain the diadem,
That princes wear, derives from them. Swift.

2. The mark of royalty worn on the head; the crown.

A crown,
Golden in shew, is but a wreath of thorns;
Brings dangers, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights,
To him who wears the regal diadem. Milton.

Why should he ravish then that diadem
From your grey temples, which the hand of time
Must shortly plant on his? Denham.

Faction, that once made diadems her prey,
And stopt our prince in his triumphant way,
Fled like a mist before this radiant day. Roscom.

DI'ADEMED, dì'ă-dĕmd.[369] adj. [from diadem.] Adorned with a diadem; crowned.

Not so, when diadem'd with rays divine,
Touch'd with the flame that breaks from virtue's shrine,
Her priestless muse forbids the good to die,
And opes the temple of eternity. Pope.

DI'ADROM, dì'ă-drŭm.[168] n. s. [διαδρομέω.] The time in which any motion is performed; the time in which a pendulum performs its vibration.

A gry is one tenth of a line, a line one tenth of an inch, an inch one tenth of a philosophical foot, a philosophical foot one third of a pendulum; whose diadroms, in the latitude of forty-five degrees, are each equal to one second of time, or a sixtieth of a minute. Locke.

DIÆ'RESIS, dì-ĕr'ĕ-sĭs.[124] n. s. [διαίρεσις.] The separation or disjunction of syllables; as aër.

DIAGNO'STICK, dì-ăg-nŏs'tĭk. n. s. [διαγινώσκω.] A symptom by which a disease is distinguished from others.

I shall lay down some indisputable marks of this vice, that whenever, we see the tokens, we may conclude the plague is in the house:—let us hear your diagnosticks. Collier on Pride.

One of our physicians proved disappointed of his prognosticks, or rather diagnosticks. Harvey.

DIA'GONAL, dì-ăg'ō-năl.[116] adj. [διαγώνιος.] Reaching from one angle to another, so as to divide a parallelogram into equal parts.

The monstrosity of the badger is ill-contrived, and with some disadvantage; the shortness being fixed unto the legs of one side, that might have been more properly placed upon the diagonal movers. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

All sorts of stone composed of granules, will cut and rive in any direction, as well in a perpendicular, or in a diagonal, as horizontally and parallel to the side of the strata. Woodward.

DIA'GONAL, dì-ăg'ō-năl. n. s. [from the adjective.] A line drawn from angle to angle, and dividing a square into equal parts.

When a man has in his mind the idea of two lines, viz. the side and diagonal of a square, whereof the diagonal is an inch long, he may have the idea also of the division of that line into a certain number of equal parts. Locke.

DIA'GONALLY, dì-ăg'ō-năl-è. adv. [from diagonal.] In a diagonal direction.

The right and left are not defined by philosophers according to common acceptation, that is, respectively from one man unto another, or any constant site in each, as though that should be the right in one, which, upon confront or facing, stands athwart or diagonally unto the other; but were distinguished according unto their activity, and predominant locomotion, on the either side. Brown's Vulgar Err.

DI'AGRAM, dì'ă-grăm. n. s. [διαγραμμα.] A delineation of geometrical figures; a mathematical scheme.

Many a fair precept in poetry is like a seeming demonstration in the mathematicks; very specious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanick operation. Dryden.

Why do not these persons make a diagram of these cogitative lines and angles, and demonstrate their properties of perception and appetite, as plainly as we know the other properties of triangles and circles? Bentley.

DIAGRY'DIATES, dì-ă-grĭd'ĕ-ăts. n. s. [from diagrydium, Lat.] Strong purgatives made with diagrydium.

All cholerick humours ought to be evacuated by diagrydiates, mixed with tartar, or some acid, or rhubarb powder. Floyer.

DI'AL, dì'ăl.[88] n. s. [diale, Skinner.] A plate marked with lines, where a hand or shadow shows the hour.

O, gentlemen, the time of life is short:
To spend that shortness basely were too long,
Though life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at th' arrival of an hour. Shakspeare.

If the motion be very slow, we perceive it not: we have no sense of the accretive motion of plants or animals; and the sly shadow steals away upon the dial, and the quickest eye can discover no more than that it is gone. Glanville.

DIAL-PLATE, dì'ăl-plăte. n. s. [dial and plate.] That on which hours or lines are marked.

Strada tells us that the two friends, being each of them possessed of a magnetical needle, made a kind of dial-plate, inscribing it with the four and twenty letters, in the same manner as the hours of the day are marked upon the ordinary dial-plate. Addison's Spectator.

DI'ALECT, dì'ă-lĕkt. n. s. [διαλεκτος.]

1. The subdivision of a language: as the Attic, Doric, Ionic, Æolic dialects.

2. Style; manner of expression.

When themselves do practice that whereof they write, they change their dialect; and those words they shun, as if there were in them some secret sting. Hooker.

3. Language; speech.

In her youth

There is a prone and speechless dialect,
Such as moves men. Shakspeare.

If the conferring of a kindness did not bind the person upon whom it was conferred to the returns of gratitude, why, in the universal dialect of the world, are kindnesses still called obligations? South.

DIALE'CTICAL, dī-â-lĕk'tĕ-kâl. adj. [from dialectick.] Logical; argumental.

Those dialectical subtleties, that the schoolmen employ about physiological mysteries, more declare the wit of him that uses them, than increase the knowledge of sober lovers of truth. Boyle.

DIALE'CTICK, dī-â-lĕk'tĭk. n. s. [διαλεκτικη.] Logick; the art of reasoning.

DI'ALLING, dī'âl-lĭng. n. s. [from dial.] The sciaterick science; the knowledge of shadow; the art of constructing dials on which the shadow may show the hour.

DI'ALIST, dī'âl-lĭst. n. s. [from dial.] A constructor of dials.

Scientifick dialists, by the geometrick considerations of lines, have found out rules to mark out the irregular motion of the shadow in all latitudes, and on all planes. Moxon.

DIA'LOGIST, dī-âl'lō-jĭst.[116] n. s. [from dialogue.] A speaker in dialogue or conference; a writer of dialogues.

DI'ALOGUE, dī'â-lŏg.[338] n. s. [διάλογος.] A conference; a conversation between two or more, either real or feigned.

Will you hear the dialogue that the two learned men have compiled in praise of the owl and cuckoo? Shakspeare.

Oh the impudence of this wicked sex! Lascivious dialogues are innocent with you. Dryden.

In easy dialogues is Fletcher's praise:
He mov'd the mind, but had not pow'r to raise. Dryden.

To DI'ALOGUE, dī'â-lŏg. v. a. [from the noun.] To discourse with another; to confer.

Dost dialogue with thy shadow? Shakspeare.

DIALY'SIS, dī-âl'ĕ-sĭs.[116] n. s. [διάλυσις.] The figure in rhetorick by which syllables or words are divided.

DIA'METER, dī-âm'ĕ-tûr.[116] n. s. [διὰ and μέτρον.] The line which, passing through the centre of a circle, or other curvilinear figure, divides it into equal parts.

The space between the earth and the moon, according to Ptolemy, is seventeen times the diameter of the earth, which makes, in a gross account, about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Raleigh.

The bay of Naples is the most delightful one that I ever saw: it lies in almost a round figure of about thirty miles in the diameter. Addison.

DIA'METRAL, dī-âm'mĕ-trâl. adj. [from diameter.] Describing the diameter; relating to the diameter.

DIA'METRALLY, dī-âm mĕ-trâl-ĕ. adv. [from diametral.] According to the direction of a diameter; in direct opposition.

Christian piety is, beyond all other things, diametrally opposed to prophaneness and impiety of actions. Hammond.

DIAME'TRICAL, dī-â-mĕt'trĕ-kâl. adj. [from diameter.]

1. Describing a diameter.
2. Observing the direction of a diameter.

The sin of calumny is set in a most diametrical opposition to the evangelical precept of loving our neighbours as ourselves. Government of the Tongue.

DIAME'TRICALLY, dī-â-mĕt'trĕ-kâl-ĕ. adv. [from diametrical.] In a diametrical direction.

He persuaded the king to consent to what was diametrically against his conscience and his honour, and, in truth, his security. Clarendon.

Thus intercepted in its passage, the vapour, which cannot penetrate the stratum diametrically, glides along the lower surface of it, permeating the horizontal interval, which is betwixt the said dense stratum and that which lies underneath it. Woodward.

DI'AMOND, dī'â-mŭnd. n. s. [diamant, Fr. adamas, Latin.]

The diamond, the most valuable and hardest of all the gems, is, when pure, perfectly clear and pellucid as the purest water; and is eminently distinguished from all other substances by its vivid splendour, and the brightness of its reflections. It is extremely various in shape and size, being found in the greatest quantity very small, and the larger ones extremely seldom met with. The largest ever known is that in the possession of the great Mogul, which weighs two hundred and seventy-nine carats, and is computed to be worth seven hundred and seventy-nine thousand two hundred and forty-four pounds. The diamond bears the force of the strongest fires, except the concentrated solar rays, without hurt; and even that infinitely fiercest of all fires does it no injury, unless directed to its weaker parts. It bears a glass-house fire for many days, and if taken carefully out, and suffered to cool by degrees, is found as bright and beautiful as before; but if taken hastily out, it will sometimes crack, and even split into two or three pieces.

The places where we have diamonds are the East Indies and the Brazils; and though they are usually found clear and colourless, yet they are sometimes slightly tinged with the colours of the other gems, by the mixture of some metalline particles Hill on Fossils.

Give me the ring of mine you had at dinner;
Or, for the diamond, the chain you promis'd. Shakspeare.

I see how thine eye would emulate the diamond: thou hast the right arched bent of the brow. Shakspeare

The diamond is preferable and vastly superior to all others in lustre and beauty; as also in hardness, which renders it more durable and lasting, and therefore much more valuable, than any other stone. Woodward.

The diamond is by mighty monarchs worn,
Fair as the star that ushers in the morn. Blackmore.

The lively diamond drinks thy purest rays,
Collected light, compact. Thomson.

DI'APASE, dī'â-pāze. n. s. [διὰ πασῶν.] A chord including all tones. The old word for diapason. See DIAPASON.

And 'twixt them both a quadrant was the base,
Proportion'd equally by seven and nine;
Nine was the circle set in heaven's place,
All which compacted made a good diapase. Spenser.

The sweet numbers and melodious measures,
With which I wont the winged words to tie,
And make a tuneful diapase of pleasures,
Now being let to run at liberty. Spenser.

DIAPA'SON, dī-â-pā'zŏn. n. s. [διὰ πασῶν.] Diapason denotes a chord which includes all tones; it is the same with that we call an eighth, or an octave; because there are but seven tones or notes, and then the eighth is the same again with the first. Harris.

It discovereth the true coincidence of sounds into diapasons, which is the return of the same sound. Bacon.

Harsh din
Broke the fair musick that all creatures made
To their great lord, whose love their motion sway'd
In perfect diapason, whilst they stood
In first obedience, and their state of good. Milton.

Many a sweet rise, many as sweet a fall,
A full-mouth diapason swallows all. Crashaw.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man. Dryden.

DI'APER, dī'â-pûr.[93] n. s. [diapre, Fr. of uncertain etymology.]

1. Linen cloth woven in flowers, and other figures; the finest species of figured linen after damask.

Not any damsel, which her vaunteth most
In skilful knitting of soft silkin twine;
Nor any weaver, which his work doth boast
In diaper, in damask, or in lyne,
Might in their diverse cunning ever dare
With this so curious net work to compare. Spenser.

2. A napkin; a towel.

Let one attend him with a silver bason
Full of rose-water, and bestrew'd with flowers;
Another bear the ewer, a third a diaper. Shaksp.

To DI'APER, dī'â-pûr. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To variegate; to diversify; to flower.

For fear the stones her tender foot should wrong,
The ground he strew'd with flowers all along,
And diaper'd like the discolour'd mead. Spenser.

Flora useth to cloath our grand-dame Earth with a new livery, diapered with various flowers, and chequered with delightful objects. Howel.

2. To draw flowers upon clothes.

If you diaper upon folds, let your work be broken, and taken, as it were, by the half; for reason tells you, that your fold must cover somewhat unseen. Peacham on Drawing.

DIAPHANE'ITY, dī-â-fâ-nē'ĕ-tē. n. s. [from διαφανεία.] Transparency; pellucidness; power of transmitting light.

Because the outward coat of the eye ought to be pellucid, to transmit the light, which, if the eyes should always stand open, would be apt to grow dry and shrink, and lose their diaphaneity; therefore are the eye-lids so contrived as often to wink, that so they may, as it were, glaze and varnish them over with the moisture they contain. Ray.

DIAPHA'NICK, dī-â-făn'ĭk.[509] adj. [διὰ and φαίνος.] Transparent; pellucid; having the power to transmit light.

Air is an element superior, and lighter than water, through whose vast, open, subtile, diaphanick, or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, easily transpired. Raleigh.

DIA'PHANOUS, dī-ăf'fâ-nŭs.[518] adj. [διὰ and φαίνω.] Transparent; clear; translucent; pellucid; capable to transmit light.

Aristotle calleth light a quality inherent or cleaving to a diaphanous body. Raleigh.

When he had taken off the insect, he found in the leaf very little and diaphanous eggs, exactly like to those which remained in the tubes of the fly's womb. Ray.

DIAPHORE'TICK, dī-â-fŏ-rĕt'ĭk. adj. [διαφορητικος.] Sudorifick; promoting a diaphoresis or perspiration; causing sweat.

A diaphoretick medicine, or a sudorifick, is something that will provoke sweating. Watts.

Diaphoreticks, or promoters of perspiration, help the organs of digestion, because the attenuation of the aliment makes it perspirable. Arbuth.

DI'APHRAGM, dī'â-frăm.[389] n. s. [διάφραγμα.]

1. The midriff which divides the upper cavity of the body from the lower.

3. Any division or partition which divides a hollow body.

It consists of a fasciculus of bodies, round, about one sixth of an inch in diameter, hollow, and parted into numerous cells by means of diaphragms thick set throughout the whole length of the body. Woodward.

DIARRHOE'A, dī-ăr-rē'ă. n. s. [διαῤῥοια.] A flux of the belly, whereby a person frequently goes to stool, and is cured either by purging off the cause, or restringing the bowels. Quincy.

During his diarrhœa I healed up the fontanels. Wiseman.

DIARRHOE'TICK, dī-ăr-rĕt'ĭk. adj. [from diarrhœa.] Promoting the flux of the belly; solutive; purgative.

Millet is diarrhœtic, cleansing, and useful in diseases of the kidneys. Arbuthnot.

DI'ARY, dī'ă-rē. n. s. [diarium, Latin.] An account of the transactions, accidents, and observations of every day; a journal.

In sea voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men make diaries; but, in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, they omit it. Bacon.

I go on in my intended diary. Tatler.

DIA'STOLE, dī-ăs'tō-lē.[116] n. s. [διαστολη.]

1. A figure in rhetorick, by which a snort syllable is made long.

2. The dilatation of the heart.

The systole seems to resemble the forcible bending of a spring, and the diastole its flying out again to its natural state. Ray.

DIA'STYLE, dī-ăs'tīle. [δια, and στυλος, a pillar.] A sort of edifice, where the pillars stand at such a distance from one another, that three diameters of their thickness are allowed for intercolumniation. Harris.

DIATE'SSERON, dī-ă-tĕs'sĕ-rŏn. n. s. [of δια, and τέσσερα, four.] An interval in musick, composed of one greater tone, one lesser, and one greater semitone: its proportion being as four to three. It is called, in musical composition, a perfect fourth. Harris.

DIATO'NICK, dī-ă-tŏn'ĭk. adj. [of διατόνος.] The ordinary sort of musick which proceeds by different tones, either in ascending or descending. It contains only the two greater and lesser tones, and the greater semitone. Harris.

DIAZE'UTICK Tone, dī-ă-zū'tĭk. [of δια and ζεύγνυμι.] In the ancient Greek musick, disjoined two-fourths, one on each side of it; and which, being joined to either, made a fifth. This is, in our musick, from A to B.

They allowed to this diazeutick tone, which is our La, Mi, the proportion of nine to eight, as being the unalterable difference of the fifth and fourth. Harris.

DI'BBLE, dĭb'bl.[405] n. s. [from diffel, Dutch, a sharp point, Skinner; from dabble, Junius.] A small spade; a pointed instrument with which the gardeners make holes for planting.

Through cunning, with dibble, rake, mattock, and spade,
By line and by level trim garden is made.
Tusser's Husbandry.

DI'BSTONE, dĭb'stōne. n. s. A little stone which children throw at another stone.

I have seen little girls exercise whole hours together, and take abundance of pains to be expert at dibstones. Locke.

DICA'CITY, dē-kăs'sē-tē.[124] n. s. [dicacitas, Lat.] Pertness; sauciness. Dict.

DICE, dice, n. s. The plural of die. See DIE.

It is above a hundred to one against any particular throw, that you do not cast any given set of faces with four cubical dice; because there are so many several combinations of the six faces of four dice: now, after you have cast all the trials but one, it is still as much odds at the last remaining time, as it was at the first. Bentley.

To DICE, dice. v. n. [from the noun.] To game with dice.

I was as virtuously given as a gentleman need to be; virtuous enough; swore little; diced not above seven times a week. Shakspeare.

DI'CE-BOX, dice'bŏks. n. s. [dice and box.] The box from which the dice are thrown.

What would you say, should you see the sparkler shaking her elbow for a whole night together, and thumping the table with a dice-box? Addison.

DI'CER, dī'sĕr.[98] n. s. [from dice.] A player at dice; a gamester.

They make marriage vows
As false as dicers' oaths. Shakspeare.

DICH, dĭt. This word seems corrupted from dit for do it.

Rich men sin, and I eat root;
Much good dich thy good heart, Apemantus.
Shakspeare's Timon.

DICHO'TOMY, dī-kŏt'ō-mē. n. s. [διχοτομία.] Distribution of ideas by pairs.

Some persons have disturbed the order of nature, and abused their readers by an affectation of dichotomies, trichotomies, sevens, twelves, &c. Let the nature of the subject, considered together with the design which you have in view, always determine the number of parts into which you divide it. Watts.

DI'CKENS, dĭk'ĭnze. A kind of adverbial exclamation, importing, as it seems, much the same with the devil; but I know not whence derived,

Where had you this pretty weathercock?—
—I cannot tell what the dickens his name is my husband had him of. Shakspeare.

What a dickens does he mean by a trivial sum?
——But ha'nt you found it, sir? Congreve.

DI'CKER of Leather, dĭk'ĕr. n. s. [dicra, low Lat.] Ten hides. Dict.

To DI'CTATE, dĭk'tāte.[91] v. a. [dicto, Latin.] To deliver to another with authority; to declare with confidence.

The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay,
And studded amber darts a golden ray;
Such, and not nobler, in the realms above,
My wonder dictates is the dome of Jove. Pope.

Whatsoever is dictated to us by God himself, or by men who are divinely inspired, must be believed with full assurance. Watts.

DI'CTATE, dĭk'tāte.[91] n. s. [dictatum, Lat.] Rule or maxim delivered with authority; prescription; prescript.

Those right helps of art, which will scarce be found by those who servilely confine themselves to the dictates of others. Locke.

I credit what the Grecian dictates say,
And Samian sounds o'er Scota's hills convey.
Prior.

Then let this dictate of my love prevail. Pope.

DICTA'TION, dĭk-tā'shŭn. n. s. [from dictate.] The act or practice of dictating or prescribing. Dict.

DICTA'TOR, dĭk-tā'tŭr.[521] n. s. [Lat.]

1. A magistrate of Rome, made in times of exigence and distress, and invested with absolute authority.

Kind dictators made, when they came home,
Their vanquish'd foes free citizens of Rome.
Waller.

Julius with honour tam'd Rome's foreign foes;
But patriots fell, ere the dictator rose. Prior.

2. One invested with absolute authority.

Unanimous they all commit the care
And management of this main enterprize
To him, their great dictator. Milton.

3. One whose credit or authority enables him to direct the conduct or opinion of others.

Nor is it a small power it gives one man over another, to have the authority to be the dictator of principles, and teacher of unquestionable truths. Locke.

That riches, honours, and outward splendor, should set up persons for dictators to all the rest of mankind, is a most shameful invasion of the right of our understanding. Watts.

DICTATO'RIAL, dĭk-tă-tō'rē-ăl. adj. [from dictator.] Authoritative; confident; dogmatical; overbearing.

A young academick often dwells upon a journal, or an observator that treats of trade and politicks in a dictatorial stile, and is lavish in the praise of the author. Watts.

DICTA'TORSHIP, dĭk-tā'tŭr-shĭp. n. s. [from dictator.]

1. The office of dictator.

This is the solemnest title they can confer under the princedom, being indeed a kind of dictatorship. Wotton.

2. Authority; insolent confidence.

This is that perpetual dictatorship which is exercised by Lucretius, though often in the wrong. Dryden.

DI'CTATURE, dĭk-tā'tshŭre. n. s. [dictatura, Latin.] The office of a dictator; dictatorship. Dict.

DI'CTION, dĭk'shŭn. n. s. [diction, Fr. dictio, Lat.] Style; language; expression.

DI'CTIONARY, dĭk'shŭn-ă-rē. n. s. [dictionarium, Lat.] A book containing the words of any language in alphabetical order, with explanations of their meaning; a lexicon; a vocabulary; a word-book.

Some have delivered the polity of spirits, and left an account that they stand in awe of charms, spells, and conjurations; that they are afraid of letters and characters, notes and dashes, which, set together, do signify nothing; and not only in the dictionary of man, but in the subtler vocabulary of Satan. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

Is it such a fault to translate simulacra images? I see what a good thing it is to have a good catholick dictionary. Stillingfleet.

An army, or a parliament, is a collection of men; a dictionary, or nomenclature, is a collection of words. Watts.

DID, dĭd, of do. [ðið, Saxon.]

1. The preterit of do.

Thou canst not say I did it. Shakspeare.

What did that greatness in a woman's mind?
Ill lodg'd, and weak to act what it design'd.
Dryden.

2. The sign of the preter-imperfect tense, or perfect.

When did his pen on learning fix a brand,
Or rail at arts he did not understand? Dryden.

3. It is sometimes used emphatically: as, I did really love him.

DIDA'CTICAL, dė-dâk'tė-kâl. } adj. [διδακ-
DIDA'CTICK, dė-dâk'tîk.[124] } τικος.] Preceptive; giving precepts; as a didactick poem is a poem that gives rules for some art; as the Georgicks.

The means used to this purpose are partly didactical, and partly protreptical; demonstrating the truth of the gospel, and then urging the professors of those truths to be stedfast in the faith, and to beware of infidelity. Ward on Infidelity.

DI DAPPER, dī'dâp-pûr. n. s. [from dip.] A bird that dives into the water.

DIDASCA'LICK, dī-dâs-kâl'îk.[125] [509] adj. [διδασκαλικος.] Preceptive; didactic; giving precepts in some art.

I found it necessary to form some story, and give a kind of body to the poem: under what species it may be comprehended, whether didascalick or heroick, I leave to the judgment of the criticks. Prior.

To DI'DDER, dîd'ûr. v. a. [diddern, Teut. zittern, Germ.] To quake with cold; to shiver. A provincial word. Skinner.

DIDST, didst. The second person of the preter tense of do. See DID.

Oh last and best of Scots! who didst maintain Thy country's freedom from a foreign reign. Dryden.

DIDU'CTION, dė-dûk'shûn. n. s. [diductio, Latin.] Separation by withdrawing one part from the other.

He ought to shew what kind of strings they are, which, though strongly fastened to the inside of the receiver, and superficies of the bladder, must draw as forcibly one as another, in comparison of those that within the bladder draw so as to hinder the diduction of its sides. Boyle.

To DIE, dī. v. a. [ðeaȝ, Sax, a colour.] To tinge; to colour; to stain.

So much of death her thoughts
Had entertain'd, as died her cheeks with pale. Milton.

All white, a virgin saint she sought the skies;
For marriage, though it sullies not, it dies. Dryd.

DIE, dī. n. s. [from the verb.] Colour; tincture; stain; hue acquired.

It will help me nothing
To plead mine innocence, for that die is on me,
Which makes my whit'st part black. Shaksp.

We have dainty works of feathers of wonderful lustre, excellent dies, and many. Bacon.

Darkness we see emerges into light,
And shining suns descend to sable night:
Ev'n heaven itself receives another die,
When wearied animals in slumbers lie
Of midnight ease; another, when the gray
Of morn preludes the splendor of the day. Dryden.

It is surprising to see the images of the mind stamped upon the aspect; to see the cheeks take the die of the passions, and appear in all the colours of thought. Collier of the Aspect.

To DIE, dī. v. n. [ðeaðian, Sax.]

1. To lose life; to expire; to pass into another state of existence.

Thou dost kill me with thy falsehood; and it grieves me not to die, but it grieves me that thou art the murtherer. Sidney.

Nor did the third his conquests long survive,
Dying ere scarce he had begun to live. Addison.

Oh let me live my own, and die so too!
To live and die is all I have to do. Denham.

2. To perish by violence or disease.

The dira only served to confirm him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat. Dryden.

Talk not of life or ransom, he replies;
Patroclus dead, whoever meets me, dies:
In vain a single Trojan sues for grace;
But least the sons of Priam's hateful race;
Die then, my friend! what boots it to deplore?
The great, the good Patroclus is no more!
He, far thy better, was foredoom'd to die;
And thou, dost thou, bewail mortality? Pope.

3. It has by before an instrument of death.

Their young men shall die by the sword; their sons and daughters shall die by famine. Jerem.

4. Of before a disease.

They often come into the world clear, and with the appearance of sound bodies; which, notwithstanding, have been infected with disease, and have died of it, or at least have been very infirm. Wiseman.

5. For commonly before a privative, and of before a positive cause: these prepositions are not always truly distinguished.

At first she startles, then she stands amaz'd;
At last with terror she from thence doth fly,
And loaths the wat'ry glass wherein she gaz'd,
And shuns it still, altho' for thirst she die. Davies.

He in the loaden vineyard dies for thirst. Addison.

Hipparchus being passionately fond of his own wife, who was enamoured of Bathyllus, leaped and died of his fall. Addison.

6. To be punished with death.

If I die for it, as no less is threatened me, the king my old master must be relieved. Shaksp.

What is the love of our neighbour?—
—The valuing him as the image of God, one for whom Christ died. Hammond.

7. To be lost; to perish; to come to nothing.

How now, my lord, why do you keep alone?
Of sorriest fancies your companion making,
Using those thoughts which should indeed have died
With them they think on. Shaksp.

If any sovereignty, on account of his property, had been vested in Adam, which in truth there was not, it would have died with him. Locke.

Whatever pleasure any man may take in spreading whispers, he will find greater satisfaction by letting the secret die within his own breast. Spectator.

8. To sink; to faint.

His heart died within him; and he became as a stone. 1 Samuel.

9. [In theology.] To perish everlastingly.

So long as God shall live, so long shall the damned die. Hakewill on Providence.

10. To languish with pleasure or tenderness.

To sounds of heav'nly harps she dies away,
And melts in visions of eternal day. Pope.

11. To vanish.

This battle fares like to the morning's war,
When dying clouds contend with growing light. Shakspeare.

The smaller stains and blemishes may die away and disappear, amidst the brightness that surrounds them; but a blot of a deeper nature casts a shade on all the other beauties, and darkens the whole character. Addison's Spectator.

12. [In the style of lovers.] To languish with affection.

The young men acknowledged, in love-letters, that they died for Rebecca. Tatler.

13. To wither, as a vegetable.

Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. John.

14. To grow vapid, as liquor.

DIE, dī. n. s. pl. DICE, dise. [dé, Fr. dis, Welsh.]

1. A small cube marked on its faces with numbers from one to six, which gamesters throw in play.

Keep a gamester from the dice, and a good student from his book, and it is wonderful. Shak.

I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die. Shaksp.

He knows which way the lot and the die shall fall, as perfectly as if they were already cast. South.

2. Hazard; chance.

Eftsoons his cruel hand sir Guyon staid,
Temp'ring the passion with advisement slow;
And must'ring might on enemy dismay'd;
For th' equal die of war he well did know. Fairy Queen.

So both to battle fierce arranged are;
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my spear: such is the die of war. Fairy Queen.

Thine is th' adventure, thine the victory;
Well has thy fortune turn'd the die for thee. Dryden.

3. Any cubic body.

Young creatures have learned spelling of words by having them pasted upon little flat tablets or dice. Watts.

DIE, dī. n. s. plur. DIES, dize. The stamp used in coinage.

Such variety of dies made use of by Wood in stamping his money, makes the discovery of counterfeits more difficult. Swift.

DI'ER, dī'ûr.[98] n. s. [from die.] One who follows the trade of dying; one who dies clothes.

The fleece, that has been by the dier stain'd,
Never again its native whiteness gain'd. Waller.

There were some of very low rank and professions who acquired great estates; coblers, diers, and shoemakers gave public shows to the people. Arbuthnot.

DI'ET, dī'êt. n. s. [diæta, low Latin; διαιτα.]

1. Food; provisions for the mouth; victuals.

They cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of diet, than to maintain life. Raleigh.

Time may come, when men
With angels may participate; and find
No inconvenient diet, nor too light fare. Milton.

No part of diet, in any season, is so healthful, so natural, and so agreeable to the stomach, as good and well-ripened fruits. Temple.

Milk appears to be a proper diet for human bodies, where acrimony is to be purged or avoided; but not where the canals are obstructed, it being void of all saline quality. Arbuthnot.

2. Food regulated by the rules of medicine, for the prevention or cure of any disease.

I commend rather some diet for certain seasons, than frequent use of physick; for those diets alter the body more, and trouble it less. Bacon.

I restrained myself to so regular a diet, as to eat flesh but once a-day, and little at a time, without salt or vinegar. Temple.

3. Allowance of provision.

For his diet, there was a continual diet given him by the king. Jeremiah.

To DI'ET, dī'êt. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To feed by the rules of medicine.

She diets him with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both early and eke late. Fairy Queen.

Shew a while like fearful war,
To diet rank minds sick of happiness;

And purge the obstructions which begin to stop
Our very veins of life. Shaksp.
He was not taken well, he had not din'd:
The veins unfill'd, our blood is cold; and then
We powt upon the morning, are unapt
To give or to forgive; but when we've stuff'd
These pipes, and these conveyances of blood,
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls
Than in our priestlike fasts; therefore I'll watch him
Till he be dieted to my request. Shaksp.
I will attend my husband, be his nurse,
Diet his sickness; for it is my office. Shaksp.
Henceforth my early care
Shall tend thee, and the fertile burden ease;
Till, dieted by thee, I grow mature
In knowledge as the gods, who all things know. Milton.
We have lived upon expedients, of which no country had less occasion: we have dieted a healthy body into a consumption, by plying it with physick instead of food. Swift.

2. To give food to.
I'm partly led to diet my revenge,
For that I do suspect the lusty Moor
Hath leapt into my seat. Shaksp.

3. To board; to supply with diet.

To DI'ET, dî'êt. v. n.

1. To eat by rules of physick.

2. To eat; to feed.
I join with thee calm peace and quiet:
Spare fast, that oft the gods doth diet. Milton.

DI'ET-DRINK, dî'êt-drînk. n. s. [diet and drink.] Medicated liquors; drink brewed with medicinal ingredients.
The observation will do that better than the lady's diet-drinks, or apothecary's medicines. Locke.

DI'ET, dî'êt. n. s. [from dies, an appointed day, Skinner; from diet, an old German word signifying a multitude, Junius.] An assembly of princes or estates.
An emperour in title without territory, who can ordain nothing of importance but by a diet, or assembly of the estates of many free princes, ecclesiastical and temporal. Raleigh.

DI'ETARY, dî'êt-â-rê. adj. [from diet.] Pertaining to the rules of diet. Dict.

DI'ETER, dî'êt-tûr.[98] n. s. [from diet.] One who prescribes rules for eating; one who prepares food by medicinal rules.
He sauc'd our broth as Juno had been sick,
And he her dieter. Shaksp.

DIETE'TICAL, dî-ê-têt'ê-kâl. } adj. [διαιτητικη.]
DIETE'TICK, dî-ê-têt'îk. } Relating to diet; belonging to the medicinal cautions about the use of food.
He received no other counsel than to refrain from cold drink, which was but a dietetical caution, and such as culinary prescription might have afforded. Brown.
This book of Cheyne's became the subject of conversation, and produced even sects in the dietetick philosophy. Arbuthnot.

To DI'FFER, dîf'fûr. v. n. [differo, Lat.]

1. To be distinguished from; to have properties and qualities not the same with those of another person or thing.
If the pipe be a little wet on the inside, it will make a differing sound from the same pipe dry. Bacon.
Thy prejudices, Syphax, won't discern
What virtues grow from ignorance and choice,
Nor how the hero differs from the brute. Addison's Cato.
The several parts of the same animal differ in their qualities. Arbuthnot.

2. To contend; to be at variance.
A man of judgment shall sometimes hear ignorant men differ, and know well within himself that those which so differ mean one thing, and yet they themselves never agree. Bacon.
Here uncontroll'd you may in judgment sit;
We'll never differ with a crowded pit. Rowe.

3. To be of a contrary opinion.
In things purely speculative, as these are, and no ingredients of our faith, it is free to differ from one another in our opinions and sentiments. Burnet.
There are certain measures to be kept, which may leave a tendency rather to gain than to irritate those who differ with you in their sentiments. Addison.
Others differ with me about the truth and reality of these speculations. Cheyne.

DI'FFERENCE, dîf'fûr-ênse.[555] n. s. [differentia, Lat.]

1. State of being distinct from something; contrariety to identity.
Where the faith of the holy church is one, a difference between customs of the church doth no harm. Hooker.

2. The quality by which one differs from another.
This nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the succession of blood, but to the succession of virtue. Raleigh.
Thus, born alike, from virtue first began
The diff'rence that distinguish'd man from man:
He claim'd no title from descent of blood;
But that which made him noble, made him good. Dryden.
Though it be useful to discern every variety that is to be found in nature, yet it is not convenient to consider every difference that is in things, and divide them into distinct classes under every such difference. Locke.

3. The disproportion between one thing and another, caused by the qualities of each.
You shall see great difference betwixt our Bohemia and your Sicilia. Shaksp.
Oh the strange difference of man and man!
To thee a woman's services are due;
My soul usurps my body. Shaksp.
Here might be seen a great difference between men practised to fight, and men accustomed only to spoil. Hayward.

4. Dispute; debate; quarrel; controversy.
What was the difference?——It was a contention in public. Shaksp.
He is weary of his life, that hath a difference with any of them, and will walk abroad after daylight. Sandys.
Nothing could have fallen out more unluckily than that there should be such differences among them about that which they pretend to be the only means of ending differences. Tillotson.

5. Distinction.
Our constitution does not only make a difference between the guilty and the innocent, but, even among the guilty, between such as are more or less criminal. Addison.

6. Point in question; ground of controversy.
Are you acquainted with the difference
That holds this present question in the court? Shaksp.

7. A logical distinction.
Some are never without a difference; and commonly, by amusing men with a subtilty, blanch the matter. Bacon.

8. Evidences of distinction; differential marks.
Henry had the title of sovereign, yet did not put those things in execution, which are the true marks and differences of sovereignty. Davies.

9. Distinct kind.
This is notoriously known in some differences of brake or fern. Brown.

To DI'FFERENCE, dîf'fûr-ênse. v. a. [from the noun.] To cause a difference; to make one thing not the same as another.
Most are apt to seek all the differences of letters in those articulating motions; whereas several combinations of letters are framed by the very same motions of those organs which are commonly observed, and are differenced by other concurrent causes. Holder.
Grass differenceth a civil and well cultivated region from a barren and desolate wilderness. Ray.
We see nothing that differences the courage of Mnestheus from that of Sergesthus. Pope.

DI'FFERENT, dîf'fûr-ênt. adj. [from differ.]

1. Distinct; not the same.
There are covered galleries that lead from the palace to five different churches. Addison.

2. Of contrary qualities.
The Britons change
Sweet native home for unaccustom'd air,
And other climes, where diff'rent food and soil
Portend distempers. Philips.

3. Unlike; dissimilar.
Neither the shape of faces, nor the age, nor the colour, ought to be alike in all figures, any more than the hair; because men are as different from each other, as the regions in which they are born are different. Dryden.
Happiness consists in things which produce pleasure, and in the absence of those which cause any pain: now these, to different men are very different things. Locke.

DIFFERE'NTIAL Method, dîf-fûr-ên'shâl, is applied to the doctrine of infinitesimals, or infinitely small quantities, called the arithmetick of fluxions. It consists in descending from whole quantities to their infinitely small differences, and comparing together these infinitely small differences, of what kind soever they be: and from thence it takes the name of the differential calculus, or analysis of infinitesimals. Harris.

DI'FFERENTLY, dîf'fûr-ênt-lê. adv. [from different.] In a different manner.
He may consider how differently he is affected by the same thought, which presents itself in a great writer, from what he is when he finds it delivered by an ordinary genius. Addison.

DI'FFERINGLY, dîf'fûr-îng-lê. adv. [from differing.] In a different manner.
Such protuberant and concave parts of a surface may remit the light so differingly, as to vary a colour. Boyle.

DI'FFICIL, dîf'fê-sîl. adj. [difficilis, Latin.]

1. Difficult; hard; not easy; not obvious. Little used.
That that should give motion to an unwieldy bulk, which itself hath neither bulk nor motion, is of as difficil apprehension as any mystery in nature. Glanville.
Latin was not more difficil,
Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle. Hudibras.

2. Scrupulous; hard to be persuaded.
The cardinal finding the pope difficil in granting the dispensation, doth use it as a principal argument, concerning the king's merit, that he had touched none of those deniers which had been levied by popes in England. Bacon.

DI'FFICILNESS, dîf'fê-sîl-nês. n. s. [from difficil.] Difficulty to be persuaded; in-compliance; impracticability. A word not in use, but proper.

There be that in their nature do not affect the good of others: the lighter sort of malignity turneth but to a crossness, or frowardness, or aptness to oppose, or difficilness, or the like; but the deeper sort, to envy or mere mischief. Bacon.

DI'FFICULT, dĭf'fĕ-kŭlt. adj. [from difficilis, Latin.]

1. Hard; not easy; not facil.

It is difficult in the eyes of this people. Zachariah.

2. Troublesome; vexatious.

3. Hard to please; peevish; morose.

DI'FFICULTLY, dĭf'fĕ-kŭlt-lĕ. adv. [from difficult.] Hardly; with difficulty; not easily.

A man who has always indulged himself in the full enjoyment of his station, will difficultly be persuaded to think any methods unjust that offer to continue it. Rogers.

DI'FFICULTY, dĭf'fĕ-kŭl-tĕ. n. s. [from difficult; difficulté, Fr.]

1. Hardness; contrariety to easiness or facility.

The religion which, by this covenant, we engage ourselves to observe, is a work of labour and difficulty; a service that requires our greatest care and attention. Rogers.

2. That which is hard to accomplish; that which is not easy.

They mistake difficulties for impossibilities: a pernicious mistake certainly; and the more pernicious, for that men are seldom convinced of it, till their convictions do them no good. South.

3. Distress; opposition.

Thus, by degrees, he rose to Jove's imperial seat;
Thus difficulties prove a soul legitimately great. Dryden.

4. Perplexity in affairs; uneasiness of circumstances.

They lie under some difficulties by reason of the emperor's displeasure, who has forbidden their manufactures. Addison.

5. Objection; cavil.

Men should consider, that raising difficulties concerning the mysteries in religion, cannot make them more wise, learned, or virtuous. Swift.

To DIFFI'DE, dĭf-fīde'. v. n. [diffido, Lat.] To distrust; to have no confidence in.

With hope and fear
The woman did the new solution hear;
The man diffides in his own augury,
And doubts the gods. Dryden.

DI'FFIDENCE, dĭf'fĕ-dĕnse. n. s. [from diffide.]

1. Distrust; want of confidence in others.

No man almost thought himself secure, and men durst scarce commune or talk one with another: but there was a general diffidence every where. Bacon.

You have brought scandal
To Israel, diffidence of God, and doubt
In feeble hearts, propense enough before
To waver. Milton.

2. Doubt; want of confidence in ourselves.

If the evidence of its being, or that this is its true sense, be only on probable proofs, our assent can reach no higher than an assurance or diffidence arising from the more or less apparent probability of the proofs. Locke.

Be silent always when you doubt your sense;
And speak, though sure, with seeming diffidence. Pope.

Whatsoever atheists think on, or whatsoever they look on, all do administer some reasons for suspicion and diffidence, lest possibly they may be in the wrong; and then it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. Bentley.

DI'FFIDENT, dĭf'fĕ-dĕnt. adj. [from diffide.]

1. Distrustful; doubting others.

Be not diffident
Of wisdom; she deserts thee not, if thou
Dismiss not her, when most thou need'st her nigh. Milton.

Pliny speaks of the Seres, the same people with the Chinese, as being very shy and diffident in their manner of dealing. Arbuthnot.

2. Doubtful of an event, used of things; uncertain.

I was really so diffident of it, as to let it lie by me these two years, just as you now see it. Pope.

3. Doubtful of himself; not confident.

I am not so confident of my own sufficiency, as not willingly to admit the counsel of others; but yet I am not so diffident of myself, as brutishly to submit to any man's dictates. King Charles.

Distress makes the humble heart diffident. Clarissa.

To DIFFI'ND, dĭf-fĭnd'. v. a. [diffindo, Lat.] To cleave in two; to split. Dict.

DIFFI'SSION, dĭf-fĭsh'ŭn. n. s. [diffissio, Lat.] The act of cleaving or splitting. Dict.

DIFFLA'TION, dĭf-flā'shŭn. n. s. [difflare, Lat.] The act of scattering with a blast of wind. Dict.

DI'FFLUENCE, dĭf'flŭ-ĕnse. } n. s. [from DI'FFLUENCY, dĭf'flŭ-ĕn-sĕ. } diffluo, Lat.] The quality of falling away on all sides; the effect of fluidity; the contrary to consistency.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffluency; and omitteth not its essence, but condition of fluidity. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

DI'FFLUENT, dĭf'flŭ-ĕnt.[518] adj. [diffluens, Lat.] Flowing every way; not consistent; not fixed.

DI'FFORM, dĭf'fôrm. adj. [from forma, Lat.] Contrary to uniform; having parts of different structure; dissimilar; unlike; irregular: as, a difform flower, one of which the leaves are unlike each other.

The unequal refractions of difform rays proceed not from any contingent irregularities; such as are veins, an uneven polish, or fortuitous position of the pores of glass. Newton.

DIFFO'RMITY, dĭf-fôr'mĕ-tĕ. n. s. [from difform.] Diversity of form; irregularity; dissimilitude.

While they murmur against the present disposure of things, they desire in them a difformity from the primitive rule, and the idea of that mind that formed all things best. Brown.

DIFFRA'NCHISEMENT, dĭf-frăn'tshĭz-mĕnt. n. s. [franchise, Fr.] The act of taking away the privileges of a city.

To DIFFU'SE, dĭf-fūze'. v. a. [diffusus, Lat.]

1. To pour out upon a plane, so that the liquor may run every way; to pour without particular direction.

When these waters began to rise at first, long before they could swell to the height of the mountains, they would diffuse themselves every way. Burnet.

2. To spread; to scatter; to disperse.

Wisdom had ordain'd
Good out of evil to create; instead
Of spirits malign, a better race to bring
Into their vacant room, and thence diffuse
His good to worlds, and ages, infinite. Milton.

No sect wants its apostles to propagate and diffuse it. Decay of Piety.

A chief renown'd in war,
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name,
And through the conquer'd world diffuse our fame. Dryden.

His eyes diffus'd a venerable grace,
And charity itself was in his face. Dryden.

DIFFU'SE, dĭf-fūse'. adj. [diffusus, Lat.]

1. Scattered; widely spread.

2. Copious; not concise.

DIFFU'SED, dĭf-fūzd'.[369] participial adj. [from diffuse.] This word seems to have signified, in Shakspeare's time, the same as wild, uncouth, irregular.

Let them from forth a sawpit rush at once,
With some diffused song. Shakspeare.

He grows like savages,
To swearing and stern looks, diffus'd attire,
And every thing that seems unnatural. Shaksp.

DIFFU'SEDLY, dĭf-fū'zĕd-lĕ [364] adv. [from diffused.] Widely; dispersedly; in manner of that which is spread every way.

DIFFU'SEDNESS, dĭf-fū'zĕd-nĕs.[365] n. s. [from diffused.] The state of being diffused; dispersion.

DIFFU'SELY, dĭf-fūse'lĕ. adv. [from diffuse.]

1. Widely; extensively.

2. Copiously; not concisely.

DIFFU'SION, dĭf-fū'zhŭn. n. s. [from diffuse.]

1. Dispersion; the state of being scattered every way.

Whereas all bodies act either by the communication of their natures, or by the impressions and signatures of their motions, the diffusion of species visible seemeth to participate more of the former operation, and the species audible of the latter. Bacon's Natural History.

A sheet of very well sleeked marbled paper did not cast distinct colours upon the wall, nor throw its light with an equal diffusion; but threw its beams, unstained and bright, to this and that part of the wall. Boyle on Colours.

2. Copiousness; exuberance of style.

DIFFU'SIVE, dĭf-fū'sĭv.[428] adj. [from diffuse.]

1. Having the quality of scattering any thing every way.

Diffusive of themselves, where'er they pass
They make that warmth in others they expect:
Their valour works like bodies on a glass,
And does its image on their men project. Dryden.

2. Scattered; dispersed; having the quality of suffering diffusion.

All liquid bodies are diffusive; for their parts, being in motion, have no connexion, but glide and fall off any way. Burnet.

No man is of so general and diffusive a lust, as to prosecute his amours all the world over. South.

The stars, no longer overlaid with weight,
Exert their heads from underneath the mass,
And upward shoot, and kindle as they pass,
And with diffusive light adorn their heav'nly place. Dryden.

Cherish'd with hope, and fed with joy it grows;
Its cheerful buds their opening bloom disclose,
And round the happy soil diffusive odour flows. Prior.

3. Extended.

They are not agreed among themselves where infallibility is seated; whether in the pope alone, or a council alone, or in both together, or in the diffusive body of christians. Tillotson.

DIFFU'SIVELY, dĭf-fū'sĭv-lĕ. adv. [from diffusive.] Widely; extensively; every way.

DIFFU'SIVENESS, dîf-fû'sîv-nês. n. s. [from diffusive.]

1. Extension; dispersion; the power of diffusing; the state of being diffused.
2. Want of conciseness; large compass of expression.

The fault that I find with a modern legend, is its diffusiveness: you have sometimes the whole side of a medal over-run with it. Addison.

To DIG, dîg. v. a. pret. dug, or digged; part. pass. dug, or digged. [ðic, Sax. a ditch; dyger, Danish, to dig.]

1. To pierce with a spade.

Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall; and when I had digged in the wall, I beheld a door. Ezekiel.

2. To form by digging.

Seek with heart and mouth to build up the walls of Jerusalem, which you have broken down, and to fill up the mines that you have digged by craft and subtlety, to overthrow the same. Whitgift.

He built towers in the desert, and digged many wells, for he had much cattle. 2 Chronicles.

3. To cultivate the ground by turning it with a spade.

The walks of your garden, without their furniture, look as ill as those of your house; so that you cannot dig up your garden too often. Temple.

Be first to dig the ground, be first to burn
The branches lopt. Dryden.

4. To pierce with a sharp point.

A rav'nous vulture in his open side
Her crooked beak and cruel talons tried;
Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast,
The growing liver still supplied the feast. Dryden.

5. To gain by digging.

It is digged out of even the highest mountains, and all parts of the earth contingently; as the pyrites. Woodward.

Nor was the ground alone requir'd to bear
Her annual income to the crooked share;
But greedy mortals, rummaging her store,
Digg'd from her entrails first the precious ore.
Dryden's Ovid.

To DIG, dîg. v. n. To work with a spade; to work in making holes, or turning the ground.

They long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures. Job.

The Italians have often dug into lands, described in old authors as the places where statues or obelisks stood, and seldom failed of success. Addison.

To DIG up, dîg ûp. v. a. To throw up that which is covered with earth.

If I digg'd up thy forefathers' graves,
And hung their rotten coffins up in chains,
It would not slake mine ire. Shakspeare.

DI'GAMY, dîg'gâ-mê. n. s. [δίγαμία.] Second marriage; marriage to a second wife after the death of the first: as bigamy, having two wives at once.

Dr. Champny only proves, that archbishop Cranmer was twice married; which is not denied: but brings nothing to prove that such bigamy, or digamy rather, deprives a bishop of the lawful use of his power of ordaining. Bishop Ferne.

DI'GERENT, dê'jê-rênt. adj. [digerens, Lat.] That has the power of digesting, or causing digestion. Dict.

DI'GEST, dî'jêst.[492] n. s. [digesta, Latin.] The pandect of the civil law, containing the opinions of the ancient lawyers.

I had a purpose to make a particular digest, or recompilement to the laws of mine own nation. Bacon.

Laws in the digest shew that the Romans applied themselves to trade. Arbuthnot on Coins.

To DIGE'ST, dê-jêst'.[124] v. a. [digero, digestum, Lat.]

1. To distribute into various classes or repositories; to range or dispose methodically.
2. To concoct in the stomach, so as that the various particles of food may be applied to their proper use.

If little faults, proceeding on distemper,
Shall not be wink'd at, how shall we stretch our eye,
When capital crimes chew'd, swallow'd, and digested,
Appear? Shakspeare's Henry V.

Each then has organs to digest his food;
One to beget, and one receive, the brood. Prior.

3. To soften by heat, as in a boiler, or in a dunghill: a chymical term.
4. To range methodically in the mind; to apply knowledge by meditation to its proper use.

Chosen friends, with sense refin'd,
Learning digested well. Thomson.

5. To reduce to any plan, scheme, or method.

Our play
Leaps o'er the vaunt and firstlings of those broils,
'Ginning i' th' middle: starting thence away
To what may be digested in a play. Shakspeare.

6. To receive without loathing or repugnance; not to reject.

First, let us go to dinner.
—Nay, let me praise you while I have a stomach,
—No, pray thee, let it serve for table-talk;
Then, howsoe'er thou speak'st, 'mongst other things
I shall digest it. Shakspeare.

The pleasance of numbers is, that rudeness and barbarism might be the better taste and digest the lessons of civility. Peacham.

7. To receive and enjoy.

Cornwal and Albany,
With my two daughters' dowers, digest the third.
Shakspeare.

8. [In chirurgery.] To dispose a wound to generate pus in order to a cure.

To DIGE'ST, dê-jêst'. v. n. To generate matter, as a wound, and tend to a cure.

DIGE'STER, dê-jês'tûr. n. s. [from digest.]

1. He that digests or disposes.
2. He that digests or concocts his food.

People that are bilious and fat, rather than lean, are great eaters and ill digesters. Arbuthnot.

3. A strong vessel or engine, contrived by M. Papin, wherein to boil, with a very strong heat, any bony substances so as to reduce them into a fluid state. Quincy.
4. That which causes or strengthens the concoctive power.

Rice is of excellent use for all illnesses of the stomach, a great restorer of health, and a great digester. Temple.

DIGE'STIBLE, dê-jês'tê-bl. adj. [from digest.] Capable of being digested or concocted.

Those medicines that purge by stool are, at the first, not digestible by the stomach, and therefore move immediately downwards to the guts. Bacon

DIGE'STION, dê-jês'tshûn. n. s. [from digest.]

1. The act of digesting or concocting food in the stomach.

Now good digestion wait on appetite,
And health on both. Shakspeare.

Digestion is a fermentation begun, because there are all the requisites of such a fermentation; heat, air, and motion: but it is not a complete fermentation, because that requires a greater time than the continuance of the aliment in the stomach: vegetable putrefaction resembles very much animal digestion. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Quantity of food cannot be determined by measures and weights, or any general Lessian rules; but must vary with the vigour or decays of age or of health, and the use or disuse of air or of exercise, with the changes of appetite; and then, by what every man may find or suspect of the present strength or weakness of digestion. Temple.

Every morsel to a satisfied hunger, is only a new labour to a tired digestion. South.

2. The preparation of matter by a chymical heat.

We conceive, indeed, that a perfect good concoction, or digestion, or maturation of some metals, will produce gold. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

Did chymick chance the furnaces prepare,
Raise all the labour-houses of the air,
And lay crude vapours in digestion there? Blackmore.

3. Reduction to a plan; the act of methodising; the maturation of a design.

The digestion of the counsels in Sweden is made in senate, consisting of forty counsellors, who are generally the greatest men. Temple.

4. The act of disposing a wound to generate matter.
5. The disposition of a wound or sore to generate matter.

The first stage of healing, or the discharge of matter, is by surgeons called digestion. Sharp.

DIGE'STIVE, dê-jês'tîv. adj. [from digest.]

1. Having the power to cause digestion, or to strengthen the stomach.

A chillifactory menstruum, or a digestive preparation, drawn from species or individuals, whose stomachs peculiarly dissolve lapideous bodies. Brown.

2. Capable by heat to soften and subdue.

The earth and sun were in that very state; the one active, piercing, and digestive, by its heat; the other passive, receptive, and stored with materials for such a production. Hale.

3. Methodising; adjusting.

To business ripen'd by digestive thought,
This future rule is into method brought. Dryden.

DIGE'STIVE, dê-jês'tîv. n. s. [from digest.] An application which disposes a wound to generate matter.

I dressed it with digestives. Wiseman.

DIGE'STURE, dê-jês'tshûre. n. s. Concoction. Not used.

Neither tie yourself always to eat meats of easy digesture; such as veal, sweetbreads. Harvey.

DI'GGER, dîg'gûr.[98] n. s. [from dig.] One that opens the ground with a spade.

When we visited mines, we have been told by diggers, that even when the sky seemed clear, there would suddenly arise a steam so thick, that it would put out their candles. Boyle.

To DIGHT, dite.[393] v. a. [ðihtan, to prepare, to regulate, Sax.]

1. To dress; to deck; to bedeck; to embellish; to adorn. It seems always to signify the past: the participle passive is dight, as dighted in Hudibras is perhaps improper.

Let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloisters pale;
And love the high embowered roof,
With antick pillar, massy proof;
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light. Milton.

Just so the proud insulting lass
Array'd and dighted Hudibras. Hudibras.

2. To put on.

On his head his dreadful hat he dight,
Which maketh him invisible to sight. Hubb. Tale.

DI'GIT, dĭd'jĭt. n. s. [digitus, Lat.]

1. The measure of length containing three fourths of an inch.

If the inverted tube of mercury be but twenty-five digits high, or somewhat more, the quick-silver will not fall, but remain suspended in the tube, because it cannot press the subjacent mercury with so great a force as doth the incumbent cylinder of the air, reaching thence to the top of the atmosphere. Boyle.

2. The twelfth part of the diameter of the sun or moon.

3. Any of the numbers expressed by single figures; any number to ten: so called from counting upon the fingers.

Not only the numbers seven and nine, from considerations abstruse, have been extolled by most, but all or most of other digits have been as mystically applauded. Brown.

DI'GITATED, dĭd'jĕ-tā-tĕd. adj. [from digitus, Lat.] Branched out into divisions like fingers: as a digitated leaf is a leaf composed of many small leaves.

For animals multifidous, or such as are digitated, or have several divisions in their feet, there are but two that are uniparous; that is, men and elephants. Brown's Vulg. Err.

DIGLADIA'TION, dī-glā-dē-ā'shŭn.[125] n. s. [digladiatio, Lat.] A combat with swords; any quarrel or contest.

Aristotle seems purposely to intend the cherishing of controversial digladiations, by his own affection of an intricate obscurity. Glanville.

DI'GNIFIED, dĭg'nē-fide.[282] adj. [from dignify.] Invested with some dignity: it is used chiefly of the clergy.

Abbots are stiled dignified clerks, as having some dignity in the church. Ayliffe.

DIGNIFICA'TION, dĭg-nē-fē-kā'shŭn. n. s. [from dignify.] Exaltation.

I grant that where a noble and ancient descent and merit meet in any man, it is a double dignification of that person. Walton.

To DI'GNIFY, dĭg'nē-fi.[183] v. a. [from dignus and facio, Latin.]

1. To advance; to prefer; to exalt. Used chiefly of the clergy.

2. To honour; to adorn; to give lustre to; to improve by some adventitious excellence, or honourable distinction.

Such a day,
So fought, so follow'd, and so fairly won,
Came not till now to dignify the times
Since Cæsar's fortunes! Shaksp.

Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But that your worth will dignify our feast.
Ben Jonson.

No turbots dignify my boards;
But gudgeons, flounders, what my Thames affords.
Pope.

DI'GNITARY, dĭg'nē-tā-rē. n. s. [from dignus, Lat.] A clergyman advanced to some dignity, to some rank above that of a parochial priest.

If there be any dignitaries, whose preferments are perhaps not liable to the accusation of superfluity, they may be persons of superior merit. Swift.

DI'GNITY, dĭg'nē-tē. n. s. [dignitas, Lat.]

1. Rank of elevation.

Angels are not any where spoken so highly of as our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and are not in dignity equal to him. Hooker.

2. Grandeur of mien; elevation of aspect.

Some men have a native dignity, which will procure them more regard by a look, than others can obtain by the most imperious commands. Clarissa.

3. Advancement; preferment; high place

Faster than spring-time show'rs comes thought on thought,
And not a thought but thinks on dignity. Shaksp.

For those of old,
And these late dignities heap'd up to them. Shaksp.

4. [Among ecclesiasticks.] By a dignity we understand that promotion or preferment to which any jurisdiction is annexed. Ayliffe's Parergon.

5. Maxims; general principles; κυριαὶ δοξαὶ.

The sciences concluding from dignities, and principles known by themselves, receive not satisfaction from probable reasons, much less from bare asseverations. Brown.

6. [In astrology.] The planet is in dignity when it is in any sign.

DIGNO'TION, dĭg-nō'shŭn. n. s. [from dignosco, Lat.] Distinction; distinguishing mark.

That temperamental dignotions, and conjecture of prevalent humours, may be collected from spots in our nails, we are not averse to concede. Brown.

To DIGRE'SS, dē-grĕs'.[124] v. n. [digressus, Lat.]

1. To turn aside out of the road.

2. To depart from the main design of a discourse, or chief tenour of an argument.

In the pursuit of an argument there is hardly room to digress into a particular definition, as often as a man varies the signification of any term. Locke.

3. To wander; to expatiate.

It seemeth (to digress no farther) that the Tartarians, spreading so far, cannot be the Israelites. Brerewood.

4. To go out of the right way, or common track; to transgress; to deviate. Not in use.

I am come to keep my word,
Though in some part am forced to digress,
Which at more leisure I will so excuse
As you shall be well satisfied. Shaksp.

Thy noble shape is but a form of wax,
Digressing from the valour of a man. Shaksp.

DIGRE'SSION, dē-grĕsh'ŭn. n. s. [digressio, Lat.]

1. A passage deviating from the mean tenour or design of a discourse.

The good man thought so much of his late conceived commonwealth, that all other matters were but digressions to him. Sidney.

He, she knew, would intermix
Grateful digressions, and solve high dispute
With conjugal caressess. Milton.

Here some digression I must make, t' accuse
Thee, my forgetful and ungrateful muse. Denham.

To content and fill the eye of the understanding, the best authors sprinkle their works with pleasing digressions, with which they recreate the minds of their readers. Dryden.

2. Deviation.

The digression of the sun is not equal; but, near the equinoctial intersections, it is right and greater; near the solstices more oblique and lesser. Brown.

DIJUDICA'TION, dī-jū-dē-kā'shŭn.[125] n. s. [dijudicatio, Lat.] Judicial distinction.

DIKE, dīke. n. s. [ðic, Saxon; dyk, Erse.]

1. A channel to receive water.

The dykes are fill'd, and with a roaring sound
The rising rivers float the nether ground. Dryden.

The king of dykes! than whom no sluice of mud
With deeper sable blots the silver flood. Pope.

2. A mound to hinder inundations.

God, that breaks up the flood-gates, of so great a deluge, and all the art and industry of man is not sufficient to raise up dykes and ramparts against it. Cowley.

To DILA'CERATE, dē-lăs'sē-rāte.[124] v. a. [dilacero, Lat.] To tear; to rend; to force in two.

The infant at the accomplished period, struggling to come forth, dilacerates and breaks those parts which restrained him before. Brown.

DILACERA'TION, dē-lăs-sē-rā'shŭn. n. s. [from dilaceratio, Lat.] The act of rending in two.

The greatest sensation of pain is by the obstruction of the small vessels, and dilaceration of the nervous fibres. Arbuthnot.

To DILA'NIATE, dē-lā'nē-āte.[124] v. a. [dilanio, Lat.] To tear; to rend in pieces.

Rather than they would dilaniate the entrails of their own mother, and expose her thereby to be ravished, they met half way in a gallant kind. Howel.

To DILA'PIDATE, dē-lăp'ē-dāte. v. n. [dilapido, Lat.] To go to ruin; to fall by decay.

DILAPIDA'TION, dē-lăp-ē-dā'shŭn.[124] n. s. [dilapidatio, Lat.] The incumbent's suffering the chancel, or any other edifices of his ecclesiastical living, to go to ruin or decay, by neglecting to repair the same: and it likewise extends to his committing, or suffering to be committed, any wilful waste in or upon the glebe-woods, or any other inheritance of the church. Ayliffe's Parergon.

'Tis the duty of all church-wardens to prevent the dilapidations of the chancel and mansion-house belonging to the rector or vicar. Ayliffe.

DILATABI'LITY, dē-lā-tā-bĭl'ē-tē. n. s. [from dilatable.] The quality of admitting extension.

We take notice of the wonderful dilatability or extensiveness of the gullets of serpents: I have taken two adult mice out of the stomach of an adder, whose neck was not bigger than my little finger. Ray.

By this continual contractibility and dilatability, by different degrees of heat, the air is kept in a constant motion. Arbuthnot.

DILA'TABLE, dē-lā'tā-bl.[405] adj. [from dilate.] Capable of extension.

The windpipe divides itself into a great number of branches, called bronchia: these end in small air bladders, dilatable and contractible, capable to be inflated by the admission of air, and to subside at the expulsion of it. Arbuthnot.

DILATA'TION, dĭl-lā-tā'shŭn.[530] n. s. [from dilatatio, Lat.]

1. The act of extending into greater space: opposed to contraction.

The motions of the tongue, by contraction and dilatation, are so easy and so subtle, that you can hardly conceive or distinguish them aright. Holder.

2. The state of being extended; the state in which the parts are at more distance from each other.

Joy causeth a cheerfulness and vigour in the eyes: singing, leaping, dancing, and sometimes tears: all these are the effects of the dilatation, and coming forth of the spirits into the outward parts. Bacon.

The image of the sun should be drawn out into an oblong form, either by a dilatation of every ray, or by any other casual inequality of the refractions. Newton.

To DILA'TE, dė-lāte'.[124] v. a. [dilato, Lat.]

1. To extend; to spread out; to enlarge: opposed to contract.

But ye thereby much greater glory gate,
Than had ye sorted with a prince's peer;
For now your light doth more itself dilate,
And in my darkness greater doth appear. Spenser.

Satan alarm'd,
Collecting all his might, dilated stood,
Like Teneriff, or Atlas, unremov'd. Milton.

Opener of mine eyes,
Dim erst; dilated spirits, ampler heart,
And growing up to godhead: which for thee
Chiefly I sought; without thee can despise. Milton.

Through all the air his sounding strings dilate
Sorrow, like that which touch'd our hearts of late. Waller.

Diffus'd, it rises in a higher sphere;
Dilates its drops, and softens into air. Prior.

I mark the various fury of the winds;
These neither seasons guide, nor order binds:
They now dilate and now contract their force;
Various their speed, but endless is their course. Prior.

The second refraction would spread the rays one way as much as the first doth another, and so dilate the image in breadth as much as the first doth in length. Newton.

2. To relate at large; to tell diffusely and copiously.

But he would not endure that woful theam
For to dilate at large; but urged sore,
With piercing words, and pitiful implore,
Him hasty to arise. Fairy Queen.

I observing,
Took once a pliant hour, and found good means
To draw from her a prayer of earnest heart
That I would all my pilgrimage dilate,
Whereof by parcels she had something heard,
But not distinctly. Shaksp.

To DILA'TE, dė-lāte'. v. n.

1. To widen; to grow wide.

His heart dilates and glories in his strength. Addison.

2. To speak largely and copiously.

It may be behoveful for princes, in matters of grace, to transact the same publickly, and by themselves; or their ministers to dilate upon it, and improve their lustre, by any addition or eloquence of speech. Clarendon.

DILA'TOR, dė-lā'tûr.[166] n. s. [from dilate.] That which widens or extends.

The buccinatores, or blowers up of the cheeks, and the dilators of the nose, are too strong in cholerick people. Arbuthnot.

DI'LATORINESS, dil'lā-tûr-ė-nės. n. s. [from dilatory.] The quality of being dilatory; slowness; sluggishness.

DI'LATORY, dil'ā-tûr-ė.[512] adj. [dilatoire, Fr. dilatorius, Lat.] Tardy; slow; given to procrastination; addicted to delay; sluggish; loitering.

An inferior council, after former tedious suits in a higher court, would be but dilatory, and so to little purpose. Hayward.

What wound did ever heal but by degrees?
Thou know'st we work by wit and not by witchcraft?
And wit depends on dilatory time. Shaksp.

These cardinals trifle with me; I abhor
This dilatory sloth and tricks of Rome. Shaksp.

Dilatory fortune plays the jilt
With the brave, noble, honest, gallant man,
To throw herself away on fools and knaves. Otway.

A dilatory temper commits innumerable cruelties without design. Addison.

DILE'CTION, dė-lėk'shŭn.[124] n. s. [dilectio, Lat.] The act of loving; kindness.

So free is Christ's dilection, that the grand condition of our felicity is our belief. Boyle.

DILE'MMA, di-lėm'mâ.[119] n. s. [διλημμα.]

1. An argument equally conclusive by contrary suppositions. A young rhetorician applied to an old sophist to be taught the art of pleading, and bargained for a certain reward to be paid, when he should gain a cause. The master sued for his reward, and the scholar endeavoured to elude his claim by a dilemma: If I gain my cause, I shall withhold your pay, because the judge's award will be against you; if I lose it, I may withhold it, because I shall not yet have gained a cause. On the contrary, says the master, if you gain your cause, you must pay me, because you are to pay me when you gain a cause; if you lose it, you must pay me, because the judge will award it.

A dilemma, that Morton used to raise benevolence, some called his fork, and some his crutch. Bacon.

Hope, whose weak being ruin'd is
Alike if it succeed, and if it miss;
Whom good or ill does equally confound,
And both the horns of fate's dilemma wound. Cowley.

2. A difficult or doubtful choice; a vexatious alternative.

A strong dilemma in a desp'rate case!
To act with infamy, or quit the place. Swift.

A dire dilemma, either way I'm sped;
If foes they write, if friends they read, me dead. Pope.

DI'LIGENCE, dil'ė-jėnse. n. s. [diligentia, Lat.] Industry; assiduity; constancy in business; continuance of endeavour; unintermitted application; the contrary to idleness.

Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me. 2 Timothy.

Brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure. 2 Peter.

DI'LIGENT, dil'ė-jėnt. adj. [diligens, Lat.]

1. Constant in application; persevering in endeavour; assiduous; not idle; not negligent; not lazy.

Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings. Proverbs.

2. Constantly applied; prosecuted with activity and perseverance; assiduous.

And the judges shall make diligent inquisition. Deuteronomy.

DI'LIGENTLY, dil'ė-jėnt-lė. adv. [from diligent.] With assiduity; with heed and perseverance; not carelessly; not idly; not negligently.

If you inquire not attentively and diligently, you shall never be able to discern a number of mechanical motions. Bacon.

The ancients have diligently examined in what consists the beauty of good postures. Dryden.

DILL, dil. n. s. [dile, Sax.] An herb, which hath a slender, fibrose, annual root; the leaves are like those of fennel; the seeds are oval, plain, streaked, and bordered.

Dill is raised of seed, which is ripe in August. Mortimer.

DILU'CID, dė-lū'sid.[124] adj. [dilucidus, Lat.]

1. Clear; not opaque.

2. Clear; plain; not obscure.

To DILU'CIDATE, dė-lū'sė-dāte. v. a. [from dilucidare, Lat.] To make clear or plain; to explain; to free from obscurity.

I shall not extenuate, but explain and dilucidate, according to the custom of the ancients. Brown.

DILUCIDA'TION, dė-lū-sė-dā'shŭn. n. s. [from dilucidatio, Lat.] The act of making clear; explanation; exposition.

DI'LUENT, dil'lū-ėnt. adj. [diluens, Lat.] Having the power to thin and attenuate other matter.

DI'LUENT, dil'lū-ėnt. n. s. [from the adjective.] That which thins other matter.

There is no real diluent but water; every fluid is diluent, as it contains water in it. Arbuthnot.

To DILU'TE, dė-lūte'.[124] v. a. [diluo, Lat.]

1. To make thin; to attenuate by the admixture of other parts.

Drinking a large dose of diluted tea, as she was ordered by a physician, she got to bed. Locke.

The aliment ought to be thin to dilute, demulcent to temper, or acid to subdue. Arbuthnot.

2. To make weak.

The chamber was dark, lest these colours should be diluted and weakened by the mixture of any adventitious light. Newton.

DILU'TE, dė-lūte. adj. Thin; attenuated.

If the red and blue colours were more dilute and weak, the distance of the images would be less than an inch: and if they were more intense and full, that distance would be greater. Newton.

DILU'TER, dė-lū'tûr. n. s. [from dilute.] That which makes any thing else thin.

Water is the only diluter, and the best dissolvent of most of the ingredients of our aliment. Arbuthnot.

DILU'TION, dė-lū'shŭn. n. s. [dilutio, Lat.] The act of making any thing thin or weak.

Opposite to dilution is coagulation or thickening, which is performed by dissipating the most liquid parts by heat, or by insinuating some substances, which make the parts of the fluid cohere more strongly. Arbuthnot.

DILU'VIAN, dė-lū'vė-ăn.[124] adj. [from diluvium, Lat.] Relating to the deluge.

Suppose that this diluvian lake should rise to the mountain tops in one place, and not diffuse itself equally into all countries about. Burnet.

DIM, dim. adj. [dimme, Saxon; dy, Welsh; dow, Erse.]

1. Not having a quick sight; not seeing clearly.

For her true form how can my spark discern,
Which, dim by nature, art did never clear? Davies.

2. Dull of apprehension.

The understanding is dim, and cannot by its natural light discover spiritual truths. Rogers.

3. Not clearly seen; obscure; imperfectly discovered.

We might be able to aim at some dim and seeming conception, how matter might begin to exist by the power of that eternal first Being. Locke.

Something, as dim to our internal view,
Is thus perhaps the cause of all we do. Pope.

4. Obstructing the act of vision; not luminous; somewhat dark.

Her face right wondrous fair did seem to be,
That her broad beauty's beam great brightness threw

He turn'd a tyrant in his latter days,
And from the bright meridian where he stood,
Descending, dipp'd his hands in lover's blood.
Dryden.

The kindred arts shall in their praise conspire,
One dip the pencil, and one string the lyre. Pope.

Now, on fancy's easy wing convey'd,
The king descended to th' Elysian shade;
There in a dusky vale, where Lethe rolls,
Old Bavius sits to dip poetic souls. Pope.

So fishes, rising from the main,
Can soar with moisten'd wings on high;
The moisture dried, they sink again,
And dip their wings again to fly. Swift.

2. To moisten; to wet.

And though not mortal, yet a cold shudd'ring dew
Dips me all o'er, as when the wrath of Jove Speaks thunder. Milton.

3. To be engaged in any affair.

When men are once dipt, what with the encouragements of sense, custom, facility, and shame of departing from what they have given themselves up to, they go on till they are stifled. L'Estrange.

In Richard's time, I doubt, he was a little dipt in the rebellion of the commons. Dryden.

4. To engage as a pledge: generally used for the first mortgage.

Be careful still of the main chance, my son;
Put out the principal in trusty hands,
Live on the use, and never dip thy lands. Dryden.

To DIP, dĭp. v. n.

1. To sink; to immerge.

We have snakes in our cups, and in our dishes; and whoever dips too deep will find death in the pot. L'Estrange.

2. To enter; to pierce.

The vulture dipping in Prometheus' side,
His bloody beak with his torn liver dyed.
Granville.

3. To enter slightly into any thing.

When I think all the repetitions are struck out in a copy, I sometimes find more upon dipping in the first volume. Pope.

4. To take that which comes first; to choose by chance.

With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possess'd?
Would'st thou prefer him to some man? Suppose
I dipp'd amongst the worst, and Staius chose?
Dryden.

DI'PCHICK, dĭp'tshĭk. n. s. [dip and chick.] The name of a bird.

Dipchick is so named of his diving and littleness.
Carew.

DIPE'TALOUS, dĭ-pĕt'ă-lŭs. adj. [δὶς and πέταλον.] Having two flower leaves.

DI'PHTHONG, dĭp'*th*ŏng. n. s. [δίφθογγος.] A coalition of two vowels to form one sound: as, vain, leave, Cæsar.

We see how many disputes the simple and ambiguous nature of vowels created among grammarians, and how it has begot the mistake concerning diphthongs: all that are properly so are syllables, and not diphthongs, as is intended to be signified by that word. Holder.

Make a diphthong of the second eta and iota, instead of their being two syllables, and the objection is gone. Pope.

DI'PLOE, dĕ'plō. n. s. The inner plate or lamina of the skull.

DIPLO'MA, dĕ'plō'mă.[124] n. s. [διπλωμα.] A letter or writing conferring some privilege; so called, because they used formerly to be written on waxed tables, and folded together.

DI'PPER, dĭp'pŭr.[98] n. s. [from dip.] One that dips in the water.

DI'PPING Needle, dĭp'pĭng-nēē-dl. n. s. A device which shows a particular property of the magnetick needle, so that, besides its polarity or verticity, which is its direction of altitude, or height above the horizon, when duly poised about an horizontal axis, it will always point to a determined degree of altitude, or elevation above the horizon, in this or that place respectively. Phillips.

DI'PSAS, dĭp'sâs. n. s. [Latin, from διψάω, to thirst.] A serpent, whose bite produces the sensation of unquenchable thirst.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbœna dire,
Cerastes horn'd, hydrus, and elops drear,
And dipsas. Milton.

DI'PTOTE, dĭp'tōte. n. s. [δὶπτωτα.] A noun consisting of two cases only. Clark.

DI'PTYCH, dĭp'tĭk. n. s. [diptycha, Lat. two leaves folded together.] A register of bishops and martyrs.

The commemoration of saints was made out of the diptychs of the church, as appears by multitudes of places in St. Austin. Stillingfleet.

DIRE, dire. adj. [dirus, Lat.] Dreadful; dismal; mournful; horrible; terrible; evil in a great degree.

Women fight,
To doft their dire distresses. Shakspeare.

More by intemperance die
In meats, and drinks, which on the earth shall bring Diseases dire; of which a monstrous crew
Before thee shall appear. Milton.

Hydras, and gorgons, and chimæras dire. Milton.

Or what the cross dire-looking planet smites,
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites
Milton.

Dire was the tossing, deep the groans, despair
Tended the sick. Milton.

Discord! dire sister of the slaughter'd pow'r,
Small at her birth, but rising ev'ry hour;
While scarce the skies her horrid head can bound,
She stalks on earth, and shakes the world around.
Pope.

DIRE'CT, dē-rĕkt'.[124] adj. [directus, Lat.]

1. Straight; not crooked.

2. Not oblique.

The ships would move in one and the same surface; and consequently must needs encounter when they either advance towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection of cross lines.
Bentley.

3. [In astronomy.] Appearing to an eye on earth to move progressively through the zodiack; not retrograde.

Two geomantick figures were display'd
Above his head, a warrior and a maid,
One when direct, and one when retrograde. Dryd.

4. Not collateral: as, the grandson succeeds his grandsire in a direct line.

5. Apparently tending to some end, as in a straight line.

Such was as then the state of the king, as it was no time by direct means to seek her. And such was the state of his captivated will, as he would delay no time of seeking her. Sidney.

He that does this, will be able to cast off all that is superfluous; he will see what is pertinent, what coherent; what is direct to what slides by, the question. Locke.

6. Open; not ambiguous.

There be, that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct, not crafty and involved.
Bacon.

7. Plain; express.

He no where, that I know, says it in direct words.
Locke.

To DIRE'CT, dē-rĕkt'.[117] v. a. [dirigo, directum, Latin.]

1. To aim or drive in a straight line.

Two eagles from a mountain's height,
By Jove's command, direct their rapid flight. Pope.

2. To point against, as a mark.

The spear flew hissing thro' the middle space,
And pierc'd his throat, directed at his face. Dryd.

3. To regulate; to adjust

It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.
Jeremiah.

Wisdom is profitable to direct. Ecclus.

All that is in a man's power, is to mind what the ideas are that take their turns in his understanding; or else to direct and sort and call in such as he desires. Locke.

4. To prescribe certain measures; to mark out a certain course.

He directeth it under the whole heavens, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth. Job.

5. To order; to command: to direct is a softer term than to command.

DIRE'CTER, dē-rĕk'tŭr. n. s. [director, Latin.]

1. One that directs; one that prescribes.

2. An instrument that serves to guide any manual operation.

DIRE'CTION, dē-rĕk'shŭn. n. s. [directio, Latin.]

1. Aim at a certain point.

These men's opinions are not the product of judgment, or the consequence of reason; but the effects of chance and hazard, of a mind floating at all adventures, without choice, and without direction.
Locke.

The direction of good works to a good end, is the only principle that distinguishes charity. Smalridge.

2. Tendency of motion impressed by a certain impulse.

No particle of matter, nor any combination of particles, that is, no body, can either move of itself, or of itself alter the direction of its motion.
Cheyne.

3. Order; command; prescription.

From the counsel that St Jerome giveth Læta, of taking heed how she read the apocrypha; as also by the help of other learned men's judgments, delivered in like case, we may take direction. Hooker.

Ev'n now
I put myself to thy direction. Shakspeare.

The nobles of the people digged it by the direction of the law-giver. Numbers.

Men's passions and God's direction seldom agree.
King Charles.

General directions for scholastic disputers is never to dispute upon mere trifles. Watts.

4. Regularity; adjustment.

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see.
Pope.

DIRE'CTIVE, dē-rĕk'tĭv. adj. [from direct.]

1. Having the power of direction.

A law therefore generally taken, is a directive rule unto goodness of operation. Hooker.

A power of command there is without all question, though there be some doubt in what faculty this command doth principally reside, whether in the will or the understanding. The true resolution is, that the directive command for counsel is in the understanding; and the applicative command, or empire, for putting in execution of what is directed, is in the will. Bramhall against Hobbes.

On the directive powers of the former, and the regularity of the latter, whereby it is capable of direction, depends the generation of all bodies. Grew.

2. Informing; showing the way.

Nor visited by one directive ray,
From cottage streaming, or from airy hall.
Thomson.

DIRE'CTLY, dè-rêkt'lè.[117 124] adv. [from direct.]

1. In a straight line; rectilineally.

The more a body is nearer to the eyes, and the more directly it is opposed to them, the more it is enlightened; because the light languishes and lessens, the farther it removes from its proper source. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

There was no other place assigned to any of this matter, than that whereunto its own gravity bore it, which was only directly downwards, whereby it obtained that place in the globe which was just underneath. Woodward.

If the refracted ray be returned directly back to the point of incidence, it shall be refracted by the incident ray. Newton's Opticks.

2. Immediately; apparently; without circumlocution; without any long train of consequence.

Infidels, being clean without the church, deny directly, and utterly reject, the very principles of christianity, which hereticks embrace erroneously by misconstruction. Hooker.

No man hath hitherto been so impious, as plainly and directly, to condemn prayer. Hooker.

By asserting the scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have unavoidably created to myself enemies in the papists directly, because they have kept the scripture from us what they could. Dryden.

His work directly tends to raise sentiments of honour and virtue in his readers. Addison.

No reason can be assigned, why it is best for the world that God almighty hath absolute power, which doth not directly prove that no mortal man should have the like. Swift.

DIRE'CTNESS, dè-rêkt'nês. n. s. [from direct.] Straightness; tendency to any point; the nearest way.

They argued from celestial causes only, the constant vicinity of the sun, and the directness of his rays: never suspecting that the body of the earth had so great an efficiency in the changes of the air. Bentley.

DIRE'CTOR, dè-rêk'tûr. n. s. [director, Latin.]

1. One that has authority over others; a superintendant; one that has the general management of a design or work.

Himself stood director over them, with nodding or stamping, shewing he did like or mislike those things he did not understand. Sidney.

In all affairs thou sole director. Swift.

2. A rule; an ordinance.

Common forms were not design'd
Directors to a noble mind. Swift.

3. An instructor; one who shows the proper methods of proceeding.

They are glad to use counsellors and directors in all their dealings of weight, as contracts, testaments. Hooker.

4. One who is consulted in cases of conscience.

I am her director and her guide in spiritual affairs. Dryden.

5. One appointed to transact the affairs of a trading company.

What made directors cheat in south-sea year. Pope.

6. An instrument in surgery, by which the hand is guided in its operation.

The manner of opening with a knife, is by sliding it on a director, the groove of which prevents its being misguided. Sharpe's Surgery.

DIRE'CTORY, dè-rêk'tûr-è.[512] n. s. [from director.] The book which the factious preachers published in the rebellion for the direction of their sect in acts of worship.

As to the ordinance concerning the directory, we cannot consent to the taking away of the book of common-prayer. Oxford Reasons against the Cov.

DI'REFUL, dire'fûl. adj. [This word is frequent among the poets, but has been censured as not analogical: all other words compounded with full consisting of a substantive and full: as, dreadful, or full of dread; joyful, or full of joy.] Dire; dreadful; dismal.

Point of spear it never piercen would,
Ne dint of direful sword divide the substance could. Fairy Queen.

But yet at last, whereas the direful fiend
She saw not stir, off shaking vain affright,
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end;
Then God she pray'd, and thank'd her faithful knight. Fairy Queen.

Direful hap betide that hated wretch
That makes us wretched by the death of thee. Shakspeare.

The voice of God himself speaks in the heart of men, whether they understand it or no; and by secret intimations gives the sinner a foretaste of that direful cup, which he is like to drink more deeply of hereafter. South.

I curs'd the direful author of my woes:
'Twas told again, and thence my ruin rose. Dryden.

Achilles' wrath, to Greeks the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heavenly goddess! sing. Pope.

DI'RENESS, dire'nês. n. s. [from dire.] Dismalness; horrour; hideousness.

Direness, familiar to my slaught'rous thoughts,
Cannot once start me. Shakspeare's Macbeth.

DIRE'PTION, di-rêp'shûn.[125] n. s. [direptio, Latin.] The act of plundering.

DIRGE, dûrje. [This is not a contraction of the Latin dirige, in the popish hymn Dirige gressus meos, as some pretend; but from the Teutonic dyrke, laudare, to praise and extol. Whence it is possible their dyrke, and our dirge, was a laudatory song to commemorate and applaud the dead. Verstegan. Bacon apparently derives it from dirige.] A mournful ditty; a song of lamentation.

Th' imperial jointress of this warlike state
Have we, as 'twere, with a defeated joy,
With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
Taken to wife. Shakspeare's Hamlet.

Meanwhile the body of Richard, after many indignities and reproaches, the dirges and obsequies of the common people towards tyrants, was obscurely buried. Bacon.

You from above shall hear each day
One dirge dispatch'd unto your clay;
These your own anthems shall become,
Your lasting epicedium. Sandys.

All due measures of her mourning kept,
Did office at the dirge, and by infection wept. Dryden.

DI'RIGENT, dîr'è-jênt. adj. [dirigens, Latin.]

The dirigent line in geometry is that along which the line describent is carried, in the generation of any figure. Harris.

DIRK, dûrk. n. s. [An Erse word.] A kind of dagger used in the Highlands of Scotland

In vain thy hungry mountaineers
Come forth in all their warlike geers,
The shield, the pistol, dirk, and dagger,
In which they daily wont to swagger. Tickel.

To DIRKE, dûrk. v. a. To spoil; to ruin. Obsolete.

Thy waste bigness but cumbers the ground,
And dirkes the beauties of my blossoms round. Spenser.

DIRT, dûrt.[105] n. s. [dryt, Dutch; dirt, Islandick.]

1. Mud; filth; mire; any thing that sticks to the clothes or body.

They, gilding dirt in noble verse,
Rustick philosophy rehearse. Denham.

Numbers engage their lives and labours to heap together a little dirt that shall bury them in the end. Wake.

The sea rises as high as ever, though the great heaps of dirt it brings along with it are apt to choak up the shallows. Addison.

Mark by what wretched steps their glory grows;
From dirt and sea-weed as proud Venice rose:
In each how guilt and greatness equal ran,
And all that rais'd the hero sunk the man. Pope.

Is yellow dirt the passion of thy life?
Look but on Gripus, or on Gripus' wife. Pope.

2. Meanness; sordidness.

To DIRT, dûrt. v. a. [from the noun.] To foul; to bemire; to make filthy; to bedaub; to soil; to pollute; to nasty.

Ill company is like a dog, who dirts those most whom he loves best. Swift.

DIRT-PIE, dûrt-pi'. n. s. [dirt and pie.] Forms moulded by children of clay, in imitation of pastry.

Thou settest thy heart upon that which has newly left off making of dirt-pies, and is but preparing itself for a green-sickness. Suckling.

DI'RTILY, dûrt'è-lè. adv. [from dirty.]

1. Nastily; foully; filthily.

2. Meanly; sordidly; shamefully.

Such gold as that wherewithal
Chimiques from each mineral
Are dirtily and desperately gull'd. Donne.

2. Meanness; baseness; sordidness.

DI'RTY, dûrt'è. adj. [from dirt.]

1. Foul; nasty; filthy.

Thy Dol and Helen of thy noble thoughts
Is in base durance, and contagious prison,
Haul'd thither by mechanic, dirty hands. Shaksp.

2. Sullied; cloudy; not elegant.

Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one. Locke.

3. Mean; base; despicable.

Such employments are the diseases of labour, and the rust of time, which it contracts not by lying still, but by dirty employment. Taylor.

Marriages would be made up upon more natural motives than mere dirty interests, and increase of riches without measure or end. Temple.

They come at length to grow sots and epicures, mean in their discourses, and dirty in their practices. South.

To DI'RTY, dûrt'è. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To foul; to soil.

The lords Strutts lived generously, and never used to dirty their fingers with pen, ink, and counters. Arbuthnot.

2. To disgrace; to scandalize.

DIRU'PTION, di-rûp'shûn.[125] n. s. [diruptio, Lat.]

1. The act of bursting, or breaking.

2. The state of bursting, or breaking.

DIS, dîs, or dîz.[428 435] An inseparable particle used in composition, implying commonly a privative or negative signification of the word to which it is joined: as, to arm, to disarm; to join, to disjoin. It is borrowed from des, used by the French and Spaniards in this sense: as, desnouer, to untie; desterrar, to banish: from the Latin de; as, struo, to build; destruo, to destroy.

DISABI'LITY, dĭs-â-bĭl'ĕ-tĕ.[456] n. s. [from disable.]

1. Want of power to do any thing; weakness; impotence.

Our consideration of creatures, and attention unto scriptures, are not in themselves things of like disability to breed or beget faith. Hooker.

Many withdrew themselves out of pure faintness, and disability to attend the conclusion. Raleigh.

He that knows most of himself, knows least of his knowledge, and the exercised understanding is conscious of its disability. Glanville.

The ability of mankind does not lie in the impotency or disabilities of brutes. Locke.

2. Want of proper qualifications for any purpose; legal impediment.

A suit is commenced in a temporal court for an inheritance; and the defendant pleads, in disability, that the plaintiff is a bastard. Ayliffe's Parergon.

This disadvantage, which the dissenters at present lie under, of a disability to receive church preferments, will be easily remedied by the repeal of the test. Swift.

To DISA'BLE, dĭz-â'bl.[454] v. a. [dis and able.]

1. To deprive of force; to weaken; to disqualify for any act.

The invasion and rebellion did not only disable this king to be a conqueror, but deprived him both of his kingdom and life. Davies.

Nor so is overcome
Satan, whose fall from heaven, a deadlier bruise
Disabled not to give thee thy death's wound. Milton.

A Christian's life is a perpetual exercise, a wrestling and warfare, for which sensual pleasure disables him, by yielding to that enemy, with whom he must strive. Taylor's Holy Living.

2. To hinder from action: used of things.

I have known a great fleet disabled for two months, and thereby lose great occasions by an indisposition of the admiral. Temple.

I have disabled mine estate,
By shewing something a more swelling port
Than my faint means would grant continuance.
Shakspeare.

4. To deprive of usefulness or efficacy.

Farewel, Monsieur Traveller; look you lisp, and wear strange suits; disable all the benefits of your own country. Shakspeare.

Your days I will alarm, I'll haunt your nights,
And worse than age disable your delights. Dryden.

5. To exclude, as wanting proper qualifications.

I will not disable any for proving a scholar, nor yet dissemble that I have seen many happily forced upon the course to which, by nature, they seemed much indisposed. Wotton.

To DISABU'SE, dĭs-â-bûze'. v. a. [dis and abuse.] To set free from a mistake; to disentangle from a fallacy; to set right; to undeceive.

The imposture and fallacy of our senses impose not only on common heads, but even more refined mercuries, who have the advantages of an improved reason to disabuse you. Glanville's Scepsis.

Those teeth fair Lyce must not show,
If she would bite: her lovers, though
Like birds they stoop at seeming grapes,
Are disabus'd when first she gapes. Waller.

If by simplicity you meant a general defect in those that profess angling, I hope to disabuse you. Walton's Angler.

Chaos of thought and passion all confus'd;
Still by himself abus'd or disabus'd. Pope.

The commissioners of the treasury moved the king to disafforest some forests of his, explaining themselves of such forests as lay out of the way, not near any of the king's houses. Bacon.

How happy's he, which hath due place assign'd
To his beasts, and disafforested his mind! Donne.

To DISAGRE'E, dĭs-â-grēē'. v. n. [dis and agree.]

1. To differ; not to be the same.

The mind clearly and infallibly perceives all distinct ideas to disagree; that is, the one not to be the other. Locke.

2. To differ; not to be of the same opinion.

Why both the bands in worship disagree,
And some adore the flow'r, and some the tree.
Dryden.

3. To be in a state of opposition: followed by from or with, before the opposite.

It containeth many improprieties, disagreeing almost in all things from the true and proper description. Brown.

Strange it is, that they reject the plainest sense of scripture, because it seems to disagree with what they call reason. Atterbury.

DISAGRE'EABLE, dĭs-â-grēē'â-bl. adj. [from disagree.]

1. Contrary; unsuitable.

Some demon, an enemy to the Greeks, had forced her to a conduct disagreeable to her sincerity. Broome.

2. Unpleasing; offensive.

To make the sense of esteem or disgrace sink the deeper, and be of the more weight, either agreeable or disagreeable things should constantly accompany these different states. Locke.

DISAGRE'EABLENESS, dĭs-â-grēē'â-bl-nĕs. n. s. [from disagreeable.]

1. Unsuitableness; contrariety.

2. Unpleasantness; offensiveness.

A father will hug and embrace his beloved son, for all the dirt and foulness of his cloaths; the dearness of the person easily apologizing for the disagreeableness of the habit. South.

DISAGRE'EMENT, dĭs-â-grēē'mĕnt. n. s. [from disagree.]

1. Difference; dissimilitude; diversity; not identity; not likeness.

These carry such plain and evident notes and characters, either of disagreement or affinity with one another, that the several kinds of them are easily distinguished. Woodward.

2. Difference of opinion; contrariety of sentiments.

They seemed one to cross another, as touching their several opinions about the necessity of sacraments, whereas in truth their disagreement is not great. Hooker.

To DISALLO'W, dĭs-âl-lōō'. v. a. [dis and allow.]

1. To deny authority to any.

When, said she,
Were those first counsels disallow'd by me?
Or where did I at sure tradition strike,
Provided still it were apostolic? Dryden.

2. To consider as unlawful; not to permit.

Their usual kind of disputing sheweth, that they do not disallow only these Romish ceremonies which are unprofitable, but count all unprofitable which are Romish. Hooker.

3. To censure by some posterior act.

It was known that the most eminent of those who professed his own principles, publickly disallowed his proceedings. Swift.

4. To censure; not to justify.

There is a secret, inward foreboding fear, that some evil or other will follow the doing of that which a man's own conscience disallows him in. South.

To DISALLO'W, dĭs-âl-lōō'. v. n. To refuse permission; not to grant; not to make or suppose lawful.

God doth in converts, being married, allow continuance with infidels, and yet disallow that the faithful, when they are free, should enter into bonds of wedlock with such. Hooker.

DISALLO'WABLE, dĭs-âl-lōō'â-bl. adj. [from disallow.] Not allowable; not to be suffered.

DISALLO'WANCE, dĭs-âl-lōō'ânce. n. s. [from disallow.] Prohibition.

God accepts of a thing suitable for him to receive, and for us to give, where he does not declare his refusal and disallowance of it. South.

1. To deprive of life.

2. To discourage; to deject; to depress.

The presence of a king engenders love amongst his subjects and his loyal friends, as it disanimates his enemies. Shakspeare.

He was confounded and disanimated at his presence, and added, How can the servant of my lord talk with my lord? Boyle.

DISANIMA'TION, dĭz-ân-ē-mâ'shŭn. n. s. [from disanimate.] Privation of life.

They cannot in reason retain that apprehension after death, as being affections which depend on life, and depart upon disanimation. Brown.

To DISANNU'L, dĭs-ân-nŭl' v. a. [dis and annul. This word is formed, contrarily to analogy, by those who, not knowing the meaning of the word annul, intended to form a negative sense by the needless use of the negative particle. It ought therefore to be rejected, as ungrammatical and barbarous.] To annul; to deprive of authority; to vacate; to make null; to make void; to nullify.

The Jews ordinances for us to resume, were to check our Lord himself, which hath disannulled them. Hooker.

That gave him power of disannulling of laws, and disposing of men's fortunes and estates, and the like points of absolute power, being in themselves harsh and odious. Bacon.

To be in both worlds full,
Is more than God was, who was hungry here:
Would'st thou his laws of fasting disannul?
Herbert.

Wilt thou my judgments disannul? Defame
My equal rule, to clear thyself of blame? Sandys

DISANNU'LMENT, dĭs-ân-nŭl'mĕnt. n. s. [from disannul.] The act of making void.

To DISAPPE'AR, dĭs-âp-pēre'. v. n. [disparoitre, Fr.] To be lost to view; to vanish out of sight; to fly; to go away.

She disappear'd, and left me dark! I wak'd
To find her, or for ever to deplore. Milton.

When the night and winter disappear,
The purple morning, rising with the year,
Salutes the spring. Dryden.

The pictures drawn in our minds are laid in fading colours, and, if not sometimes refreshed, vanish and disappear. Locke.

Criticks I saw that others names deface,
And fix their own with labour in their place;
Their own, like others, soon their place resign'd,
Or disappear'd, and left the first behind. Pope.

To DISAPPO'INT, dĭs-âp-pŏint'. v. a. [dis and appoint.]

1 To defeat of expectation; to balk; to hinder from something expected.

The superior Being can defeat all his designs, and disappoint all his hopes. Tillotson.

Whilst the champion, with redoubled might,
Strikes home the jav'lin, his retiring foe
Shrinks from the wound, and disappoints the blow. Addison.

There's nothing like surprising the rogues: how will they be disappointed, when they hear that thou hast prevented their revenge! Arbuthnot.

We are not only tortured by the reproaches which are offered us, but are disappointed by the silence of men when it is unexpected and humbled even by their praises. Addison.

2. It has of before the thing lost by disappointment.

The janizaries, disappointed by the bassas of the spoil, received of the bounty of Solyman a great largess. Knolles.

DISAPPOI'NTMENT, dĭs-âp-pŏint'mĕnt. n. s. [from disappoint.] Defeat of hopes, miscarriage of expectations.

It is impossible for us to know what are calamities, and what are blessings. How many accidents have passed for misfortunes, which have turned to the welfare and prosperity of the persons in whose lot they have fallen! How many disappointments have, in their consequences, saved a man from ruin! Spectator.

If we hope for things, of which we have not thoroughly considered the value, our disappointment will be greater than our pleasure in the fruition of them. Addison.

DISAPPROBA'TION, dĭs-âp-prō-bâ'shŭn. n. s. [dis and approbation.] Censure; condemnation; expression of dislike.

He was obliged to publish his letters, to shew his disapprobation of the publishing of others. Pope.

To DISAPPRO'VE, dĭs-âp-prōōv.' v. a. [desapprouver, French.]

1. To dislike; to censure.

I reason'd much, alas! but more I lov'd;

The matter being suppurated, I opened an inflamed tubercle in the great angle of the left eye, and discharged a well-concocted matter. Wiseman.

To DISCHA'RGE, dis-tshårje'. v. n. To dismiss itself; to break up.

The cloud, if it were oily or fatty, would not discharge. Bacon.

DISCHA'RGE, dis-tshårje'. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Vent; explosion; emission.

As the heat of all springs is owing to subterraneous fire, so wherever there are any extraordinary discharges of this fire, there also are the neighbouring springs hotter than ordinary. Woodward.

2. Matter vented.

The hæmorrhage being stopped, the next occurrence is a thin serous discharge. Sharp.

3. Disruption; evanescence.

Mark the discharge of the little cloud upon glass or gems, or blades of swords, and you shall see it ever break up first in the skirts, and last in the middle. Bacon.

4. Dismission from an office: as, the governour solicited his discharge.

5. Release from an obligation or penalty.

He warns
Us haply too secure of our discharge
From penalty, because from death releas'd
Some days. Milton.

6. Absolution from a crime.

The text expresses the sound estate of the conscience, not barely by its not accusing, but by its not condemning us: which word imports properly an acquittance or discharge of a man upon some precedent accusation, and a full trial and cognizance of his cause. South.

7. Ransom; price of ransom.

O, all my hopes defeated
To free him hence! But death, who sets all free,
Hath paid his ransom now and full discharge.
Milton.

DISCONFO'RMITY, dĭs-kŏn-fôr'mĕ-tē. n. s. [dis and conformity.] Want of agreement; inconsistency.

Lyes arise from errour and mistake, or malice and forgery; they consist in the disagreement and disconformity betwixt the speech and the conception of the mind, or the conception of the mind and the things themselves, or the speech and the things. Hakewill on Providence.

DISCONGRU'ITY, dĭs-kŏn-grū'ĕ-tē. n.s. [dis and congruity.] Disagreement; inconsistency.

There is want of capacity in the thing, to sustain such a duration, from the intrinsical discongruity of the one to the other. Hale.

DISCO'NSOLATE,[91] dĭs-kŏn'sō-lāte. adj. [dis and console.] Void of comfort; hopeless; sorrowful; melancholy.

See Cassius all disconsolate,
With Pindarus his bondman, on this hill. Shaksp.

If patiently thy bidding they obey,
Dismiss them not disconsolate. Milton.

The ladies and the knights, no shelter nigh,
Were dropping wet, disconsolate and wan,
And through their thin array receiv'd the rain. Dryden.

The moon reflects the sunbeams to us, and so, by illuminating the air, takes away in some measure the disconsolate darkness of our winter nights. Ray.

DISCO'NSOLATELY, dĭs-kŏn'sō-lāte-lē. adv. [from disconsolate.] In a disconsolate manner; comfortlessly.

DISCO'NSOLATENESS, dĭs-kŏn'sō-lāte-nĕs. n. s. [from disconsolate.] The state of being disconsolate.

DISCONTE'NT, dĭs-kŏn-tĕnt'. n. s. [dis and content.] Want of content; uneasiness at the present state.

I see your brows full of discontent,
Your hearts of sorrow, and your eyes of tears. Shakspeare.

Not that their pleasures caus'd her discontent,
She sigh'd, not that they stay'd, but that she went. Pope

DISCONTE'NT, dĭs-kŏn-tĕnt'. adj. [dis and content.] Uneasy at the present state; dissatisfied.

They were of their own nature circumspect and slow, discountenanced and discontent; and those the earl singled as fittest for his purpose. Hayward.

To DISCONTE'NT, dĭs-kŏn-tĕnt'. v.a. [from the noun.] To dissatisfy; to make uneasy at the present state.

I know a discontented gentleman,
Whose humble means match not his haughty spirit. Shakspeare.

The discontented now are only they
Whose crimes before did your just cause betray. Dryden.

DISCONTE'NTED, dĭs-kŏn-tĕn'tĕd. participial adj. [from discontent.] Uneasy; cheerless; malevolent.

Let us know
What will tie up your discontented sword. Shaksp.

These are, beyond comparison, the two greatest evils in this world; a diseased body, and a discontented mind. Tillotson.

The goddess, with a discontented air,
Seems to reject him, tho' she grants his pray'r. Pope.

DISCONTE'NTEDNESS, dĭs-kŏn-tĕn'tĕd-nĕs. n. s. [from discontented.] Uneasiness; want of ease; dissatisfaction.

A beautiful bust of Alexander the great casts up his face to heaven with a noble air of grief, or discontentedness, in his looks. Addison.

DISCONTE'NTMENT, dĭs-kŏn-tĕnt'mĕnt. n.s. [from discontent.] The state of being discontented; uneasiness.

These are the vices that fill them with general discontentment, as though the bosom of that famous church, wherein they live, were more noisome than any dungeon. Hooker.

The politick and artificial nourishing and entertaining of hopes, and carrying men from hopes to hopes, is one of the best antidotes against the poison of discontentments. Bacon.

DISCONTI'NUANCE, dĭs-kŏn-tĭn'ū-ânse. n.s. [from discontinue.]

1. Want of cohesion of parts; want of union of one part with another; disruption.

The stillicides of water, if there be enough to follow, will draw themselves into a small thread, because they will not discontinue; but if there be no remedy, then they cast themselves into round drops, which is the figure that saveth the body most from discontinuance. Bacon.

2. Cessation; intermission.

Let us consider whether our approaches to him are sweet and refreshing, and if we are uneasy under any long discontinuance of our conversation with him. Atterbury.

3. [In the common law.] An interruption or breaking off; as discontinuance of possession, or discontinance of process. The effect of discontinuance of possession is, that a man may not enter upon his own land or tenement alienated, whatsoever his right be unto it, or by his own authority; but must seek to recover possession by law. The effect of discontinuance of plea, is, that the instance may not be taken up again, but by a new writ to begin the suit afresh. Cowell.

DISCONTINUA'TION, dĭs-kŏn-tĭn-ū-ā'shŭn. n. s. [from discontinue.] Disruption of continuity; breach of union of parts; disruption; separation.

Upon any discontinuation of parts, made either by bubbles, or by shaking the glass, the whole mercury falls. Newton.

To DISCONTI'NUE, dĭs-kŏn-tĭn'ū. v. n. [discontinuer, Fr.]

1. To lose the cohesion of parts; to suffer separation or disruption of substances.

All bodies, ductile and tensile, as metals, that will be drawn into wires; wool and tow, that will be drawn into yarn, or thread; have in them the appetite of not discontinuing strong, which maketh them follow the force that pulleth out, and yet so as not to discontinue or forsake their own body. Bacon.

2. To lose an established or prescriptive custom or right.

Thyself shall discontinue from thine heritage that I gave thee, and I will cause thee to serve thine enemies. Jeremiah.

To DISCONTI'NUE, dĭs-kŏn-tĭn'ū. v. a.

1. To leave off; to cease any practice or habit.

Twenty puny lies I'll tell,
That men shall swear I've discontinued school
Above a twelvemonth. Shaksp.

Examine thy customs of diet, sleep, exercise, apparel, and the like; and try, in any thou shalt judge hurtful, to discontinue it by little and little; but so, as if thou find any inconvenience by the change, thou come back to it again. Bacon.

2. To break off; to interrupt.

There is that property in all letters, of aptness to be conjoined in syllables and words, through the voluble motions of the organs from one stop or figure to another, that they modify and discriminate the voice, without appearing to discontinue it. Holder.

DISCONTINU'ITY, dĭs-kŏn-tĭn-ū'ĕ-tē. n. s. [dis and continuity.] Disunity of parts; want of cohesion.

That discontinuity of parts is the principal cause of the opacity of bodies, will appear by considering that opaque substances become transparent by filling their pores with any substance of equal, or almost equal, density with their parts. Newton.

DISCONVE'NIENCE, dĭs-kŏn-vē'nē-ênse. n.s. [dis and convenience.] Incongruity; disagreement; opposition of nature.

Fear ariseth many times out of natural antipathies of nature; but in these disconveniencies of nature, deliberation hath no place at all. Bramhall.

DI'SCORD, dĭs'kôrd.[492] n. s. [discordia, Lat.]

1. Disagreement; opposition; mutual anger; reciprocal oppugnancy.

See what a scourge is laid upon your hate,
That heav'n finds means to kill your joys with love!
And I, for winking at your discords too,
Have lost a brace of kinsmen Shaksp.

He is a false witness that speaketh lies, and that soweth discord among brethren. Proverbs.

2. Difference or contrariety of qualities, particularly of sounds.

Take but degree away, untune that string,
And hark what discord follows; each thing meets
In mere oppugnancy. Shaksp.

Discord, like that of music's various parts,
Discord that makes the harmony of hearts;
Discord, that only this dispute shall bring,
Who best shall love the duke and serve the king. Dryden.

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good. Pope.

3. [In musick.] Sounds not of themselves pleasing, but necessary to be mixed with others.

It is sound alone that doth immediately and incorporeally affect most; this is most manifest in music, and concords and discords in music; for all sounds whether they be sharp or flat, if they be sweet, have a roundness and equality; and if they be harsh, are unequal: for a discord itself is but a harshness of divers sounds meeting. Bacon.

It is the lark that sings so out of tune,
Straining harsh discords and unpleasing sharps. Shaksp.

How doth music amaze us, when of discords she maketh the sweetest harmony! Peacham.

To DISCO'RD dĭs-kôrd'.[492] v. n. [discordo, Latin.] To disagree; not to suit with.

Sounds do disturb and alter the one the other; sometimes the one drowning the other, and making it not heard; sometimes the other one jarring and discording with the other, and making a confusion. Bacon.

DISCO'RDANCE, dĭs-kôr'dânse. } n. s.
DISCO'RDANCY, dĭs-kôr'dân-sē. } [from discord.] Disagreement; opposition; inconsistency.

DISCO'RDANT, dis-kŏr'dânt. adj. [discordans, Lat.]

1. Inconsistent; at variance with itself.

Myrrha was joy'd the welcome news to hear,
But, clogg'd with guilt, the joy was unsincere;
So various, so discordant is the mind,
That in our will a different will we find. Dryden.

2. Opposite; contrarious.

The discordant attraction of some wandering comets would certainly disorder the revolutions of the planets, if they approached too near them. Cheyne.

3. Incongruous; not conformable.

Hither conscience is to be referred; if by a comparison of things done with the rule there be a consonancy, then follows the sentence of approbation; if discordant from it, the sentence of condemnation. Hale.

DISCO'RDANTLY, dis-kŏr'dânt-lė. adv. [from discordant.]

1. Inconsistently; in disagreement with itself.

2. In disagreement with another.

Two strings of a musical instrument being struck together, making two noises that arrive at the ear at the same time as to sense, yield a sound differing from either of them, and as it were compounded of both; insomuch, that if they be discordantly tuned, though each of them struck apart would yield a pleasing sound, yet being struck together they make a harsh and troublesome noise. Boyle.

3. Peevishly; in a contradictious manner.

To DISCO'VER, dis-kŭv'ŭr. v. a. [découvrir, Fr. dis and cover.]

1. To show; to disclose; to bring to light; to make visible.

2. To expose to view.

The cover of the coach was made with such joints, that as they might, to avoid the weather, pull it up close, so they might put each end down, and remain as discovered and open-sighted as on horseback. Sidney.

Go draw aside the curtains and discover
The several caskets to this noble prince. Shaksp.

He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death. Job.

3. To show; not to shelter; to expose.

And now will I discover her lewdness. Hosea.

Law can discover sin, but not remove. Milton.

4. To make known; not to disguise; to reveal.

We will pass over unto those men, and we will discover ourselves unto them. Isaiah.

Eve, who unseen
Yet all had heard, with audible lament
Discover'd from the place of her retire. Milton.

5. To ken; to espy.

6. To find out; to obtain information.

He shall never by any alteration in me, discover my knowledge of his mistake. Pope.

7. To detect; to find though concealed.

Up he starts,
Discover'd and surpris'd. Milton.

Man with strength and free will arm'd
Complete, to have discover'd and repuls'd
Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend. Milton.

8. To find things or places not known before.

Some to discover islands far away. Shaksp.

Another part in squadrons bend their march
On bold adventure, to discover wide
That dismal world. Milton.

So of things. The Germans discovered printing and gunpowder.

9. To exhibit to the view.

Some high climbing hill
Which to his eye discovers unaware
The goodly prospect of some foreign land,
First seen, or some renown'd metropolis
With glistering spires and battlements adorn'd. Milton.

Not light, but rather darkness visible,
Serv'd only to discover sights of woe. Milton.

DISCO'VERABLE, dis-kŭv'ŭr-â-bl. adj. [from discover.]

1. That may be found out.

That mineral matter, which is so intermixed with the common and terrestrial matter, as not to be discoverable by human industry; or, if discoverable, diffused and scattered amongst the crasser matter, can never be separated. Woodward.

Revelation may assert two things to be join'd, whose connection or agreement is not discoverable by reason. Watts.

2. Apparent; exposed to view.

They were deceived by Satan, and that not in an invisible situation, but in an open and discoverable apparition, that is, in the form of a serpent. Brown.

It is concluded by astronomers, that the atmosphere of the moon hath no clouds nor rains, but a perpetual and uniform serenity; because nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded by the interposition of any clouds or mists. Bentley.

DISCO'VERER, dis-kŭv'ŭr-ŭr. n. s. [from discover.]

1. One that finds any thing not known before; a finder out.

If more be found out, they will not recompense the discoverer's pains, but will be fitter to be cast out. Holder.

Places receive appellations, according to the language of the discoverer, from observations made upon the people. Broome.

The Cape of Good Hope was doubled in those early times; and the Portuguese were not the first discoverers of that navigation. Arbuthnot.

An old maiden gentlewoman is the greatest discoverer of judgments; she can tell you what sin it was that set such a man's house on fire. Addison.

2. A scout; one who is put to descry the posture or number of an enemy; speculator.

Here stand my lords, and send discoverers forth,
To know the numbers of our enemies. Shaksp.

DISCO'VERY, dis-kŭv'ŭr-ė.[555] n. s. [from discover.]

1. The act of finding any thing hidden.

Of all who since have us'd the open sea,
Than the bold English none more fame have won;
Beyond the year, and out of heav'ns high way,
They made discoveries where they see no sun. Dryden.

2. The act of revealing or disclosing any secret.

What, must I hold a candle to my shame?
They in themselves, good sooth, are too, too light.
Why 'tis an office of discovery, love,
And I should be obscur'd. Shaksp.

Things that appeared amiable by the light of this world, appear of a different odious hue in the clear discoveries of the next. South.

It would be necessary to say something of the state to which the war hath reduced us; such a discovery ought to be made as late as possible. Swift.

To DISCO'UNSEL, dis-kŏŭn'sêl. v. a. [dis and counsel.] To dissuade; to give contrary advice. Obsolete.

But him that palmer from that vanity,
With temperate advice discounselled. Spenser.

DI'SCOUNT, dis'kŏŭnt.[313 493] n. s. [dis and count.] The sum refunded in a bargain.

His whole intention was, to buy a certain quantity of copper money from Wood, at a large discount, and sell them as well as he could. Swift.

To DISCOU'NT, dis-kŏŭnt'. v. a. [from the noun.] To count back; to pay back again.

My father's, mother's, brother's death I pardon:
My prayers and penance shall discount for these,
And beg of heaven to charge the bill on me. Dryden.

The farmers spitefully combin'd,
Force him to take his tithes in kind;
And Parvisol discounts arrears
By bills for taxes and repairs. Swift.

The truly upright judge will always countenance right, and discountenance wrong. Atterbury.

2. To abash; to put to shame.

Wisdom, in discourse with her,
Loses discountenanc'd, and like folly shews. Milton.

He came, and with him Eve, more loth, though first
To offend: discountenanc'd both and discompos'd. Milton.

How would one look from his majestic brow,
Seated as on the top of virtue's hill,
Discount'nance her despis'd! Milton.

DISCOU'NTENANCE, dis-kŏŭn'tė-nâns. n. s. [dis and countenance.] Cold treatment; unfavourable aspect; unfriendly regard.

He thought a little discountenance upon those persons would suppress that spirit. Clarendon.

All accidental misfortunes, how inevitable soever, were still attended with very apparent discountenance. Clarendon.

In expectation of the hour of judgment, he patiently bears all the difficulties of duty, and the discountenance he meets with from a wicked and prophane world. Rogers.

DISCOU'NTENANCER, dis-kŏŭn'tė-nân-sŭr.[98] n. s. [from discountenance.] One that discourages by cold treatment; one that depresses by unfriendly regard.

Rumours of scandal, and murmurs against the king, and his government, taxed him for a great taxer of his people, and discountenancer of his nobility. Bacon.

Wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land? Numbers.

3. It is irregularly used by Temple with to before the following word.

You may keep your beauty and your health, unless you destroy them yourself, or discourage them to stay with you, by using them ill. Temple.

DISCOU'RAGER, dis-kŭr'idje-ŭr. n. s. [from discourage.] One that impresses diffidence and terrour.

Most men in years, as they are generally discouragers of youth, are like old trees, which, being past bearing themselves, will suffer no young plants to flourish beneath them. Pope.

DISCOU'RAGEMENT, dis-kûr'ridje-mênt.[60] n. s. [from discourage.]

1. The act of deterring, or depressing hope.
2. Determent; that which deters from any thing: with from.

Amongst other impediments of any inventions, it is none of the meanest discouragements, that they are so generally derided by common opinion. Wilkins

The books read at schools and colleges are full of incitements to virtue, and discouragements from vice. Swift.

3. The cause of depression, or fear: with to, less properly.

To things we would have them learn, the great and only discouragement is, that they are called to them. Locke.

DISCOU'RSE, dis-kôrse'[318] n. s. [discours, Fr. discursus, Lat.]

1. The act of the understanding, by which it passes from premises to consequences.

By reason of that original weakness in the instruments, without which the understanding part is not able in this world by discourse to work, the very conceit of painfulness is a bridle to stay us. Hooker.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To rust in us unus'd. Shaksp.

The act of the mind which connects propositions, and deduceth conclusions from them, the schools call discourse; and we shall not miscall it, if we name it reason. Glanville.

2. Conversation; mutual intercourse of language; talk.

He waxeth wiser than himself, more by an hour's discourse than by a day's meditation. Bacon.

In thy discourse, if thou desire to please,
All such is courteous, useful, new or witty;
Usefulness comes by labour, wit by ease,
Courtesy grows in court, news in the city. Herbert.

The vanquish'd party with the victors join'd,
Nor wanted sweet discourse, the banquet of the mind. Dryden.

3. Effusion of language; speech.

Topical and superficial arguments of which there is store to be found on both sides, filling the head with a variety of thoughts, and the mouth with copious discourse, serve only to amuse the understanding and entertain company. Locke.

4. A treatise; a dissertation either written or uttered.

The discourse here is about ideas, which he says, are real things, and seen in God. Locke.

Plutarch, in his discourse upon garrulity, commends the fidelity of the companions of Ulysses. Pope.

DISGRA'CIOUS, dîz-grâ'shûs. adj. [dis and gracious.] Unpleasing.

I do suspect I have done some offence,
That seems disgracious in the city's eye. Shaksp.

To DISGUI'SE, dizg-yize'.[92] [160] v. a. [deguiser, Fr. dis and guise.]

1. To conceal by an unusual dress.

How might we disguise him?
——Alas! I know not: there is no woman's gown big enough for him. Shaksp.

Disguis'd he came; but those his children dear
Their parent soon discern'd through his disguise. Milton.

2. To hide by a counterfeit appearance; to cloak by a false show: as, he disguised his anger.

3. To disfigure; to change the form.

They saw the faces, which too well they knew,
Though then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er
With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore. Dryden.

More duteous at her call,
Than at Circean call the herd disguis'd. Milton.

Ulysses wakes, not knowing the place where he was; because Minerva made all things appear in a disguised view. Pope.

4. To deform by liquor; a low term.

DISGUI'SE, dizg-yize'.[160] n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A dress contrived to conceal the person that wears it.

They generally act in a disguise themselves, and therefore mistake all outward show and appearances for hypocrisy in others. Addison

Since I in Arcite cannot Arcite find,
The world may search in vain with all their eyes,
But never penetrate through this disguise. Dryd.

2. A false appearance; counterfeit show.

Hence guilty joys, distastes, surmises,
False oaths, false tears, deceits, disguises. Pope.

3. Disorder by drink.

You see we 've burnt our cheeks; and mine own tongue
Splits what it speaks: the wild disguise hath almost Antickt us. Shaksp.

DISGUI'SEMENT, dîzg-yize'mênt. n. s. [from disguise.] Dress of concealment.

Under that disguisement I should find opportunity to reveal myself to the owner of my heart. Sidney.

The marquis thought best to dismask his beard, and told him, that he was going covertly to take a secret view of the forwardness of his majesty's fleet: this did somewhat handsomely heal the disguisement. Wotton.

DISGUI'SER, dîzg-yi'zûr.[160] n. s. [from disguise.]

1. One that puts on a disguise.

I hope he is grown more disengaged from his intentness on his own affairs, which is quite the reverse to you, unless you are a very dexterous disguiser. Swift.

3. To produce aversion: with from.

What disgusts me from having to do with answer jobbers is, that they have no conscience. Swift.

DISGU'STFUL, dîz-gûst'fûl. adj. [disgust and full.] Nauseous; that causes aversion.

I have finished the most disgustful task that ever I undertook. Swift.

DISH, dish. n. s. [ᵭiſc, Saxon; dysc, Erse; discus, Latin.]

1. A broad wide vessel, in which food is served up at the table.

Of these he murders one; he boils the flesh,
And lays the mangled morsels in a dish. Dryd.

I saw among the ruins an old heathen altar, with this particularity in it, that it is hollowed like a dish at one end; but it was not this end on which the sacrifice was laid. Addison.

2. A deep hollow vessel for liquid food.

Who would rob a hermit of his weeds,
His few books, or his beads, or maple dish;
Or do his grey hairs any violence? Milton.

A ladle for our silver dish,
Is what I want, is what I wish. Prior.

3. The meat served in a dish; any particular kind of food.

I have here a dish of doves, that I would bestow upon your worship. Shaksp.

Let's kill him boldly, but not wrathfully;
Let's carve him as a dish fit for the gods,
Not hew him as a carcass fit for hounds. Shaksp.

The contract you pretend with that base wretch,
One bred of alms and foster'd with cold dishes,
With scraps o' th' court; it is no contract, none. Shaksp.

'Tis not the meat, but 'tis the appetite,
Makes eating a delight;
And if I like one dish
More than another, that a pheasant is. Suckling.

The earth would have been deprived of a most excellent and wholesome fare, and very many delicious dishes that we have the use and benefit of. Woodward.

Many people would, with reason, prefer the griping of an hungry belly, to those dishes which are a feast to others. Locke.

4. A kind of measure among the tinners.

They measure block-tin by the dish, which containeth a gallon. Carew.

To DISH, dîsh. v. a. [from the noun.] To serve in a dish; to send up to a table.

For conspiracy,
I know not how it tastes, though it be dish'd
For me to try. Shaksp.

To DISHEA'RTEN, dîs-hâr'tn.[103] v. a. [dis and hearten.] To discourage; to deject; to terrify; to depress.

To dishearten with fearful sentences, as though salvation could hardly be hoped for, is not so consonant with christian charity. Hooker.

Be not disheartened then, nor cloud those looks
That wont to be more cheerful and serene. Milton.

Yet neither thus dishearten'd nor dismay'd,
The time prepar'd, I waited. Milton.

It is a consideration that might dishearten those who are engaged against the common adversaries, that they promise themselves as much from the folly of enemies, as from the power of their friends. Stillingfleet.

Men cannot say, that the greatness of an evil and danger is an encouragement to men to run upon it; and that the greatness of any good and happiness ought in reason to dishearten men from the pursuit of it. Tillotson.

A true christian fervour is more than the alliances of our potent friends, or even the fears of our disheartened enemies. Atterbury.

DISHE'RISON, dîs-hêr'ê-zn.[170] n. s. [dis and herison.] The act of debarring from inheritance.

To DISHE'RIT, dîs-hêr'ît. v. a. [dis and inherit.] To cut off from hereditary succession; to debar from an inheritance.

Disherited, ran howling o'er the plain. Dryden.

To DISHE'VEL, dîsh-shêv'vêl. v. a. [decheveler, Fr.] To spread the hair disorderly; to throw the hair of a woman negligently about her head. It is not often used but in the passive participle.

A gentle lady all alone,
With garments rent, and hair dishevelled,
Wringing her hands, and making piteous moan.
Spenser.

After followed great numbers of women weeping, with dishevelled hair, scratching their faces, and tearing themselves after the manner of the country. Knolles.

A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
And mourning matrons with dishevell'd hair.
Dryden.

The flames, involv'd in smoke,
Of incense, from the sacred altar broke,
Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire.
Dryden.

You this morn beheld his ardent eyes,
Saw his arm lock'd in her dishevell'd hair. Smith.

DI'SHING, dîsh'îng. adj. [from dish.] Concave: a cant term among artificers.

For the form of the wheels, some make them more dishing, as they call it, than others; that is, more concave, by setting off the spokes and fellies more outwards. Mortimer.

DISHO'NEST, dîz-ôn'îst.[99] adj. [dis and honest.]

1. Void of probity; void of faith; faithless; wicked; fraudulent.

Justice then was neither blind to discern, nor lame to execute. It was not subject to be imposed upon by a deluded fancy, nor yet to be bribed by a glozing appetite, for an utile or jucundum to turn the balance to a false or dishonest sentence. South.

He lays it down as a principle, that right or wrong, honest and dishonest, are defined only by laws, and not by nature. Locke.

2. Unchaste; lewd.

To-morrow will we be married—I do desire it with all my heart; and I hope it is no dishonest desire, to desire to be a woman of the world. Shaksp.

3. Disgraced; dishonoured.

Dishonest with lopp'd arms the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
Dryden.

4. Disgraceful; ignominious. These two senses are scarcely English, being borrowed from the Latin idiom.

She saw her sons with purple death expire,
Her sacred domes involv'd in rolling fire;
A dreadful series of intestine wars,
Inglorious triumphs, and dishonest scars. Pope.

DISHO'NESTLY, dîz-ôn'îst'lê. adv. [from dishonest.]

1. Without faith; without probity; faithlessly; wickedly.

I protest he had the chain of me,
Tho' most dishonestly he doth deny it. Shaksp.

2. Lewdly; wantonly; unchastely.

A wise daughter should bring an inheritance to her husband; but she that liveth dishonestly is her father's heaviness. Ecclesiasticus.

DISHO'NESTY, dîz-ôn'nîs-tê. n. s. [from dishonest.]

1. Want of probity; faithlessness; violation of trust.

Their fortune depends upon their credit, and a stain of open public dishonesty must be to their disadvantage. Swift.

2. Unchastity; incontinence; lewdness.

Mrs. Ford, the honest woman, the modest wife, the virtuous creature, that hath the jealous fool to her husband! I suspect without cause, mistress, do I?—Heaven be my witness you do, if you suspect me in any dishonesty. Shaksp

DISHO'NOUR, dîz-ôn'nûr. n. s. [dis and honour.]

1. Reproach; disgrace; ignominy.

Let not my jealousies be your dishonours,
But mine own safeties. Shaksp.

He was pleased to own Lazarus even in the dishonours of the grave, and vouchsafed him in that despicable condition, the glorious title of his friend. Boyle.

Take him for your husband and your lord;
'Tis no dishonour to confer your grace
On one descended from a royal race. Dryden.

2. Reproach uttered; censure; report of infamy.

So good, that no tongue could ever
Pronounce dishonour of her; by my life
She never new harm doing. Shaksp.

To DISHO'NOUR, dîz-ôn'nûr. v. a. [dis and honour.]

1. To disgrace; to bring shame upon; to blast with infamy.

It is no vicious blot, murther, or foulness,
No unchaste action, or dishonour'd step,
That hath depriv'd me of your grace and favour.
Shaksp

This no more dishonours you at all,
Than to take in a town with gentle words,
Which else would put you to your fortune. Shaksp.

A woman that honoureth her husband, shall be judged wise of all: but she that dishonoureth him in her pride, shall be counted ungodly of all. Ecclesiasticus.

We are not so much to strain ourselves to make those virtues appear in us which really we have not, as to avoid those imperfections which may dishonour us. Dryden.

2. To violate chastity.

3. To treat with indignity.

One glimpse of glory to my issue give,
Grac'd for the little time he has to live:
Dishonour'd by the king of men he stands;
His rightful prize is ravish'd from his hands.
Dryden.

DISHO'NOURABLE, dîz-ôn'nûr-â-bl. adj. [from dishonour.]

1. Shameful; reproachful; ignominious.

He did dishonourable find
Those articles which did our state decrease.
Daniel.

2. Being in a state of neglect or disesteem.

He that is honoured in poverty, how much more in riches? and he that is dishonourable in riches how much more in poverty? Ecclus.

DISHO'NOURER, dîz-ôn'nûr-ûr. n. s. [from dishonour.]

1. One that treats another with indignity.

Preaching how meritorious with the gods
It would be, to ensnare an irreligious
Dishonourer of Dagon. Milton.

2. A violator of chastity.

To DISHO'RN, dîs-hôrn'. v. a. [dis and horn.] To strip of horns.

We'll dishorn the spirit,
And mock him home to Windsor. Shaksp.

DISHU'MOUR, dîs-ù'mûr. n. s. [dis and humour.] Peevishness; ill-humour; uneasy state of mind.

Speaking impatiently to servants, or any thing that betrays inattention or dishumour, are also criminal. Spectator.

The final issue of the matter would be, an utter neglect and disimprovement of the earth. Norris.

I cannot see how this kingdom is at any height of improvement, while four parts in five of the plantations, for thirty years past, have been real disimprovements. Swift.

To DISINCA'RCERATE, dîs-în-kâr'sê-râte. v. a. [dis and incarcerate.] To set at liberty; to free from prison.

The arsenical bodies being now coagulated, and kindled into flaming atoms, require dry and warm air, to open the earth for to disincarcerate the same venene bodies. Harvey.

DISINCLINA'TION, dîs-în-klê-nâ'shûn. n. s. [from disincline.] Want of affection; slight; dislike; ill-will not heightened to aversion.

Disappointment gave him a disinclination to the fair sex, for whom he does not express all the respect possible. Arbuthnot and Pope.

To DISINCLI'NE, dîs-în-kline. v. a. [dis and incline.] To produce dislike to; to make disaffected; to alienate affection from.

They were careful to keep up the fears and apprehensions in the people of dangers and designs, and to disincline them from any reverence or affection to the queen, whom they begun every day more implacably to hate, and consequently to disoblige. Clarendon.

DISINGENU'ITY, dîs-în-jê-nû'ê-tê'. n. s. [from disingenuous.] Meanness of artifice; unfairness.

They contract a habit of ill-nature and disingenuity necessary to their affairs, and the temper of those upon whom they are to work. Clarendon.

DISINGE'NUOUS, dîs-în-jên-û-ûs. adv. [dis and ingenuous.] Unfair; meanly; artful; vitiously subtle; sly; cunning; illiberal; unbecoming a gentleman; crafty.

'Tis disingenuous to accuse our age
Of idleness, who all our powers engage
In the same studies, the same course to hold,
Nor think our reason for new arts too old.
Denham.

It was a disingenuous way of proceeding, to oppose a judgment of charity concerning their church, to a judgment of reason concerning the nature of actions. Stillingfleet.

There cannot be any thing so disingenuous and misbecoming any rational creature, as not to yield to plain reason, and the conviction of clear arguments. Locke.

DISINGE'NUOUSLY, dîs-în-jên'û-ûs-lê. adv. [from disingenuous.] In a disingenuous manner.

DISINGE'NUOUSNESS, dîs-în-jên'û-ûs-nês. n. s. [from disingenuous.] Mean subtilty; unfairness; low craft.

I might press them with the unreasonableness, the disingenuousness, of embracing a profession to which their own hearts have an inward reluctance. Government of the Tongue.

DISINHE'RISON, dîs-în-hêr'ê-zn. n. s. [dis and inherit.]

1. The act of cutting off from any hereditary succession; the act of disinheriting.

If he stood upon his own title of the house of Lancaster, inherent in his person, he knew it was a title condemned by parliament, and generally prejudged, in the common opinion of the realm, that it tended directly to the disinherison of the line of York. Bacon.

The chief minister of the revenue was obliged to prevent, and even oppose, such disinherison. Clarendon.

2. The state of being cut off from an hereditary right.

In respect of the effects and evil consequences, the adultery of the woman is worse, as bringing bastardy into a family, and disinherisons or great injuries to the lawful children. Taylor.

To DISINHE'RIT, dîs-în-hêr'ît. v. a. [dis and inherit.] To cut off from an hereditary right; to deprive of an inheritance.

Is it then just with us to disinherit
The unborn nephews for the father's fault? Davies.

Unmuffle, ye faint stars; and thou, fair moon,
Stoop thy pale visage through an amber cloud,
And disinherit chaos that reigns here
In double night of darkness, and of slander. Milton.

Posterity stands curs'd! fair patrimony,
That I must leave ye, sons! O were I able
To waste it all myself, and leave ye none;
So disinherited, how would ye bless
Me, now your curse! Milton.

Of how fair a portion Adam disinherited his whole posterity by one single prevarication! South.

To DISINTE'R, dîs-în-têr'. v. a. [from dis and inter.] To unbury; to take as out of the grave.

The philosopher, the saint, or the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred. Addison.

DISI'NTERESSED, dîz-în'têr-ês-sêd. adj. [dis and interesse, French. It is written disinterested by those who derive it immediately from interest, and I think more properly.] Void of regard to private advantage; not biassed by particular views; impartial.

Not that tradition's parts are useless here,
When general, old, disinteress'd, and clear. Dryden.

DISI'NTERESSMENT, dîz-în'têr-ês-mênt n. s. [dis and interessement, Fr.] Disregard to private advantage; disinterest; disinterestedness. This word, like charges in the same sentence, is merely Gallick.

He has managed some of the charges of the kingdom with known ability, and laid them down with entire disinteressment. Prior.

DISI'NTEREST, dîz-în'têr-êst. n. s. [dis and interest.]

1. What is contrary to one's wish or prosperity; that which any one is concerned to prevent.

They judge it the great disinterest to Rome. Glanville.

2. Indifference to profit; superiority to regards of private advantage.

DISI'NTERESTED, dîz-în'têr-ês-têd. adj. [from disinterest.]

1. Superiour to regard of private advantage; not influenced by private profit.

As disinterested as you appear to the world, no man is more in the power of that prevailing favourite passion than yourself. Swift.

2. Without any concern in an affair; without fear or hope.

DISI'NTERESTEDLY, dîz-în'têr-ês-têd-lê. adv. [from disinterested.] In a disinterested manner.

DISI'NTERESTEDNESS, dîz-în'têr-ês-têd-nês. n. s. [from disinterested.] Contempt of private interest; neglect of personal profit.

These expressions of selfishness and disinterestedness have been used in a very loose and indeterminate manner. Brown.

To DISI'NTRICATE, dîz-în'trê-kâte. v. a. [dis and intricate.] To disentangle. Dict

To DISINVI'TE, dîs-în-vîte'. v. a. [dis and invite.] To retract an invitation. Dict.

To DISJOI'N, dîz-jôîn'. v. a. [dejoindre, Fr. dis and join.] To separate; to part from each other; to disunite; to sunder.

Never shall my harp thy praise
Forget, nor from thy father's praise disjoin. Milton.

Lest different degree
Disjoin us, and I then too late renounce
Deity for thee, when fate will not permit. Milton.

Happier for me, that all our hours assign'd
Together we had liv'd; ev'n not in death disjoin'd. Dryden.

Never let us lay down our arms against France till we have utterly disjoined her from the Spanish monarchy. Addison.

To DISJOI'NT, dîz-jôînt'. v. a. [dis and joint.]

1. To put out of joint.

Be all their ligaments at once unbound,
And their disjointed bones to powder ground. Sandys.

Yet what could swords or poisons, racks or flame,
But mangle and disjoint the brittle frame?
More fatal Henry's words: they murder Emma's fame. Prior.

2. To break at junctures; to separate at the part where there is a cement.

Mould'ring arches, and disjointed columns. Irene.

3. To break in pieces; to dilaniate.

Rotation must disperse in air
All things which on the rapid orb appear;
And if no power that motion should controul,
It must disjoint and dissipate the whole. Blackmore.

Should a barbarous Indian, who had never seen a palace or a ship, view the separate and disjointed parts, he would be able to form but a very lame and dark idea of either of those excellent and useful inventions. Watts.

4. To carve a fowl.

5. To make incoherent; to break the relation between the parts.

The constancy of your wit was not wont to bring forth such disjointed speeches. Sidney.

But now her grief has wrought her into frenzy;
The images her troubled fancy forms
Are incoherent, wild; her words disjointed. Smith.

To DISJOI'NT, dîz-jôînt'. v. n. To fall in pieces.

Let both worlds disjoint, and all things suffer,
Ere we will eat our meal in fear. Shaksp.

DISJOI'NT, dîz-jôînt'. participle. [from the verb.] Separated; divided. We now write disjointed.

Young Fontinbras,
Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
Thinks by our late dear brother's death
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame. Shaksp.

DISJUDICA'TION, dîz-jû-dê kâ'shûn. n. s. dijudicatio, Lat.] Judgment; determination: perhaps only mistaken for dijudication.

The disposition of the organ is of great importance in the disjudications we make of colours. Boyle.

DISJU'NCT, dîz-jûnkt'. adj. [disjunctus, Lat.] Disjoined; separate.

DISJU'NCTION, dîz-jûnk'shûn. n. s. [from disjunctio, Lat.] Disunion; separation; parting.

You may
Enjoy your mistress now, from whom you see
There's no disjunction to be made, but by Your ruin. Shaksp.

Their is a great analogy between the body natural and politic, in which the ecclesiastical or spiritual part justly supplies the part of the soul; and the violent separation of this from the other, does as certainly infer death and dissolution, as the disjunction of the body and the soul in the natural. South.

DISJU'NCTIVE, dîz-jûnk'tîv. adj. [disjunctivus, Lat.]

1. Incapable of union.

Such principles, whose atoms are of that disjunctive nature, as not to be united in a sufficient number to make a visible mass. Grew.

2. That marks separation or opposition: as, I love him, or fear him.

There are such words as disjunctive conjunctions. Watts.

3. In logick.

A disjunctive proposition is when the parts are opposed to one another by disjunctive particles: as, It is either day or night: The weather is either shiny or rainy; Quantity is either length, breadth or depth. The truth of disjunctives depends on the necessary and immediate opposition of the parts, therefore only the last of these examples is true: but the two first are not strictly true; because twilight is a medium between day and night; and dry cloudy weather is a medium between shining and raining.

A disjunctive syllogism is when the major proposition is disjunctive: as, the earth moves in a circle, or an ellipsis; but it does not move in a circle, therefore it moves in an ellipsis. Watts.

DISJU'NCTIVELY, dîs-jûnk'tîv-lê. adv. [from disjunctive.] Distinctly; separately.

What he observes of the numbers disjunctively and apart, reason suggests to be applicable to the whole body united. Decay of Piety.

DISK, dîsk. n. s. [discus, Lat.]

1. The face of the sun, or any planet, as it appears to the eye.

The disk of Phœbus, when he climbs on high,
Appears at first but as a bloodshot eye. Dryden.

It is to be considered that the rays, which are equally refrangible, do fall upon a circle answering to the sun's disk. Newton.

Mercury's disk
Can scarce be caught by philosophic eye,
Lost in the near effulgence. Thomson.

2. A broad piece of iron thrown in the ancient sports; a quoit.

The crystal of the eye, which in a fish is a ball, in any land animal is a disk or bowl; being hereby fitted for the clearer sight of the object. Grew.

In areas varied with mosaic art,
Some whirl the disk, and some the jav'lin dart. Pope.

Diski'ndness, dîsk-yînd'nês.[160] n. s. [dis and kindness.]

1. Want of kindness; want of affection; want of benevolence.

2. Ill turn; injury; act of malignity; detriment.

This discourse is so far from doing any diskindness to the cause, that it does it a real service. Woodward.

Disli'ke, dîz-like'.[495] n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Disinclination; absence of affection; the contrary to fondness.

He then them took, and tempering goodly well
Their contrary dislikes with loved means,
Did place them all in order, and compel
To keep themselves within their sundry reigns,
Together link'd with adamantine chains. Spenser.

Your dislikes, to whom I would be pleasing,
Do cloud my joys with danger and with sorrow. Shakspeare.

God's grace, that principle of his new birth, gives him continual dislike to sin. Hammond.

Our likings or dislikes are founded rather upon humour and fancy, than upon reason. L'Estrange.

Sorrow would have been as silent as thought, as severe as philosophy. It would have rested in inward senses, tacit dislikes. South.

The jealous man is not angry if you dislike another, but if you find those faults which are in his own character, you discover not only your dislike of another, but of himself. Addison.

2. Discord; dissension; disagreement. This sense is not now in use.

This said Aletes, and a murmur rose
That shew'd dislike among the christian peers. Fairfax.

To Disli'ke, dîz-like'. v. a. [dis and like.] To disapprove; to regard without affection; to regard with ill-will or disgust.

What most he should dislike seems pleasant to him;
What like offensive. Shakspeare.

Ye dislike, and so undo
The players, and disgrace the poet too. Denham.

Whosoever dislikes the digressions, or grows weary of them, may throw them away. Temple.

Disli'keful, dîz-like'fûl. adj. [dislike and full.] Disaffected; malign. Not in use.

I think it best, by an union of manners, and conformity of minds, to bring them to be one people, and to put away the dislikeful conceit of the one and the other. Spenser.

To Disli'ken, dîz-lî'kn. v. a. [dis and liken.] To make unlike. Unusual.

Muffle your face,
Dismantle you; and, as you can, disliken
The truth of your own seeming. Shaksp.

Disli'keness, dîz-like'nês. n. s. [dis and likeness.] Dissimilitude; not resemblance; unlikeness.

That which is not designed to represent any thing but itself, can never be capable of a wrong representation, nor mislead us from the true apprehension of any thing by its dislikeness to it; and such, excepting those of substances, are all our own complex ideas. Locke.

Disli'ker, dîz-lî'kûr. n. s. [from dislike.] A disapprover; one that is not pleased.

There is a point, which whoever can touch, will never fail of pleasing a majority, so great that the dislikers will be forced to fall in with the herd. Swift.

To Disli'mb, dîz-lîm'. v. a. [dis and limb.] To dilaniate; to tear limb from limb. Dict.

To Disli'mn, dîz-lîm'.[486] v. a. [dis and limn.] To unpaint; to strike out of a picture.

That which is now a horse, even with a thought
The rack dislimns, and makes it indistinct
As water is in water. Shakspeare.

To Di'slocate, dîs'lô-kâte. v. a. [dis and locus, Lat.]

1. To put out of the proper place.

After some time the strata on all sides of the globe were dislocated, and their situation varied, being elevated in some places, and depressed in others. Woodward.

2. To put out of joint; to disjoint.

Were 't my fitness
To let these hands obey my boiling blood,
They 're apt enough to dislocate and tear
Thy flesh and bones. Shakspeare.

Disloca'tion, dîs-lô-kâ'shûn. n. s. [from dislocate.]

1. The act of shifting the places of things.

2. The state of being displaced.

The posture of rocks, often leaning or prostrate, shews that they had some dislocation from their natural site. Burnet.

3. A luxation; a violent pressure of a bone out of the socket, or correspondent part; a joint put out.

It might go awry either within or without the upper, as often as it is forcibly pulled to it, and so cause a dislocation, or a strain. Grew.

To Dislo'dge, dîz-lôdje'. v. a. [dis and lodge.]

1. To remove from a place.

The shell-fish which are resident in the depths live and die there, and are never dislodged or removed by storms, nor cast upon the shores; which the littorales usually are. Woodward.

2. To remove from a habitation.

These senses lost, behold a new defeat,
The soul dislodging from another seat. Dryden.

3. To drive an enemy from a station.

My sword can perfect what it has begun,
And from your walls dislodge that haughty son. Dryden.

4. To remove an army to other quarters.

The ladies have prevail'd,
The Volscians are dislodg'd, and Marcus gone. Shakspeare.

To Dislo'dge, dîz-lôdje'. v. n. To go away to another place.

Soon as midnight brought on the dusky hour,
Friendliest to sleep, and silence, he resolv'd
With all his legions to dislodge. Milton.

Disloy'al, dîs-lôè'âl.[435] adj. [desloyal, Fr. dis and loyal.]

1. Not true to allegiance; faithless; false to a sovereign; disobedient.

Foul distrust, and breach
Disloyal; on the part of man, revolt
And disobedience. Milton.

2. Dishonest; perfidious.

Such things, in a false disloyal knave,
Are tricks of custom; but, in a man that 's just,
They 're cold delations working from the heart,
That passion cannot rule. Shakspeare.

3. Not true to the marriage-bed.

The lady is disloyal.
——Disloyal! The word is too good to paint out her wickedness. Shakspeare.

Disloyal town!
Speak, didst not thou
Forsake thy faith, and break thy nuptial vow? Dryden.

4. False in love; not constant. The last three senses are now obsolete.

Dislo'yally, dîz-lôè'âl-lè. adv. [from disloyal.] Not faithfully; treacherously; disobediently.

Dislo'yalty, dîz-lôè'âl-tè. n. s. [from disloyal.]

1. Want of fidelity to the sovereign.

Let the truth of that religion I profess be represented to judgment, not in the disguises of levity, schism, heresy, novelty, and disloyalty. King Charles.

2. Want of fidelity in love. Obsolete.

There shall appear such seeming truths of Hero's disloyalty, that jealousy shall be called assurance. Shakspeare.

Di'smal, dîz'mâl.[425] adj. [dies malus, Lat. an evil day.] Sorrowful; dire; horrid; melancholy; uncomfortable; unhappy; dark.

The thane of Cawder 'gan a dismal conflict. Shakspeare.

He hears
On all sides from innumerable tongues
A dismal universal hiss. Milton.

Nor yet in horrid shade or dismal den,
Nor nocent yet: but on the grassy herb
Fearless, unfear'd he slept. Milton.

The dismal situation waste and wild,
A dungeon horrible! Milton.

Such a variety of dismal accidents must have broken the spirits of any man. Clarendon.

On the one hand set the most glittering temptations to discord, and on the other view the dismal effects of it. Decay of Piety.

Dreadful gleams,
Dismal screams. Pope.

Di'smally, dîz'mâl-lè. adv. [from dismal.] Horribly; sorrowfully; uncomfortably.

Di'smalness, dîz'mâl-nês. n. s. [from dismal.] Horrour; sorrow.

To Disma'ntle, dîz-mân'tl. v. a. [dis and mantle.]

1. To deprive of a dress; to strip; to denude.

He that makes his prince despised and undervalued, and beats him out of his subjects hearts, may easily strip him of his other garrisons, having already dispossessed him of his strongest, by dismantling him of his honour, and seizing his reputation. South.

2. To loose; to throw off a dress; to throw open.

This is most strange!
That she, who ev'n but now was your best object,
Dearest and best, should in this trice of time
Commit a thing so monstrous, to dismantle
So many folds of favour. Shakspeare.

3. To strip a town of its outworks.

It is not sufficient to possess our own fort without the dismantling and demolishing of our enemies. Hakewill.

4. To break down any thing external.

His eyeballs, rooted out, are thrown to ground;
His nose dismantled in his mouth is found;
His jaws, cheeks, front, one undistinguish'd wound. Dryden.

To Disma'sk, dîz-mâsk'. v. a. [dis and mask.] To divest of a mask; to uncover from concealment.

Fair ladies mask'd are roses in the bud,
Or angels veil'd in clouds; are roses blown,
Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shewn. Shakspeare.

The marquis thought best to dismask his beard; and told him that he was going covertly. Wotton.

To DISMA'Y, dîz-mâ'.[425] v. a. [dismayar, Span.] To terrify; to discourage; to affright; to depress; to deject.

Their mighty strokes their haberjeons dismay'd. Spenser.

Enemies would not be so troublesome to the western coasts, nor that country itself would be so often dismay'd with alarms as they have of late years been. Raleigh

He will not fail thee; fear not, neither be dismayed. Deut.

Nothing can make him remiss in the practice of his duty; no prospect of interest can allure him, no fear of danger dismay him. Atterbury.

DISMA'Y, dĭz-mā'.[435] n. s. [dismayo, Span.] Fall of courage; terrour felt; desertion of mind; fear impressed.

All sate mute,
Pondering the danger with deep thoughts; and each
In other's countenance read his own dismay. Milton.

This then, not minded in dismay, yet now
Assures me that the bitterness of death
Is past. Milton.

DISMA'YEDNESS, dĭz-mā'ĕd-nĕs. n. s. [from dismay.] Dejection of courage; dispiritedness.

The valiantest feels inward dismayedness, and yet the fearfullest is ashamed fully to shew it. Sidney.

DI'SME, dime. n. s. [French.] A tenth; the tenth part; tithe.

Since the first sword was drawn about this question,
Ev'ry tithe soul 'mongst many thousand dismes
Hath been as dear as Helen. Shakspeare.

The pope began to exercise his new rapines by a compliance with king Edward, in granting him two years disme from the clergy. Ayliffe.

To DISME'MBER, dĭz-mĕm'bûr. v. a. [dis and member.] To divide member from member; to dilacerate; to cut in pieces.

I am with both, each army hath a hand;
And in their rage, I having hold of both,
They whirl asunder, and dismember me. Shaksp.

O, that we then could come by Cæsar's spirit,
And not dismember Cæsar! but, alas!
Cæsar must bleed for it. Shakspeare.

A state can never arrive to its period in a more deplorable crisis, than when some prince lies hovering, like a vulture, to devour or dismember its dying carcase. Swift.

Fowls obscene dismember'd his remains,
And dogs had torn him on the naked plains. Pope.

Those who contemplate only the fragments or pieces of science dispersed in short unconnected discourses, can never survey an entire body of truth, but must always view it as deformed and dismembered. Watts.

To DISMI'SS, dĭz-mĭs'.[435] v. a. [dimissus, Lat.]

1. To send away.

We commit thee thither,
Until his army be dismiss'd from him. Shaksp.

He dismissed the assembly. Acts.

2. To give leave of departure.

If our young Iulus be no more,
Dismiss our navy from your friendly shore. Dryden.

3. To discard; to divest of an office.

DISMI'SSION, dĭz-mĭsh'ŭn. n. s. [from dimissio, Lat.]

1. Dispatch; act of sending away.

So pois'd, so gently she descends from high,
It seems a soft dismission from the sky. Dryden.

2. An honourable discharge from any office or place.

Not only thou degrad'st them, or remit'st
To life obscure, which were a fair dismission;
But throw'st them lower than thou didst exalt them high. Milton.

3. Deprivation; obligation to leave any post or place.

You must not stay here longer; your dismission
Is come from Cæsar. Shakspeare.

To DISMO'RTGAGE, dĭz-mŏr'gāje. v. a. [dis and mortgage.] To redeem from mortgage.

He dismortgaged the crown demesnes, and left behind a mass of gold. Howel.

To DISMO'UNT, dĭz-mŏŭnt'. v. a. [demonter, Fr.]

1. To throw off a horse.

From this flying steed unrein'd, as once
Bellerophon, though from a lower clime,
Dismounted, on th' Aleian field I fall Milton.

2. To throw from any elevation or place of honour.

3. To throw a cannon from its carriage.

The Turks artillery, planted against that tower, was by the christian cannoneers dismounted with shot from the tower, and many of the gunners slain. Knolles.

To DISMO'UNT, dĭz-mŏŭnt'. v. n.

1. To alight from a horse.

When he came within sight of that prodigious army at Agincourt, he ordered all his cavalry to dismount, and implore upon their knees a blessing. Addison.

2. To descend from any elevation.

To DISNA'TURALIZE, dĭz-nătsh'ŭ-rā-lize. v. a. [dis and naturalize.] To alienate; to make alien; to deprive of the privileges of birth.

DISNA'TURED, dĭz-nā'tshŭrd.[435] adj. [dis and nature.] Unnatural; wanting natural tenderness; devoid of natural affection. Unusual.

If she must teem,
Create her child of spleen, that it may live,
And be a thwart disnatur'd torment to her. Shaksp.

DISOBE'DIENCE, dĭs-ō-bē'dē-ĕnse. n. s. [dis and obedience.]

1. Violation of lawful command or prohibition; breach of duty due to superiours.

Th' offence is holy that she hath committed;
And this deceit loses the name of craft,
Of disobedience or unduteous title. Shaksp.

Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, sing heavenly muse. Milton.

Murder, adultery, or disobedience to parents, have a general notion antecedently to laws. Stillingfleet.

This is not disobedience, but rebellion; 'tis disclaiming the sovereignty of Christ, and renouncing all allegiance to his authority. Rogers.

2. Incompliance.

If planetary orbs the sun obey,
Why should the moon disown his sovereign sway?
Why in a whirling eddy of her own
Around the globe terrestrial should she run?
This disobedience of the moon will prove
The sun's bright orb does not the planets move.
Blackmore

DISOBE'DIENT, dĭs-ō-bē'dē-ĕnt. adj. [dis and obedient.] Not observant of lawful authority; guilty of the breach of lawful commands, or prohibition.

The man of God was disobedient unto the word of the Lord. 1 Kings.

To DISOBE'Y, dĭs-ō-bā'. v. a. [dis and obey.] To break commands, or transgress prohibitions.

She absolutely bade him, and he durst not know how to disobey. Sidney.

He's loth to disobey the god's command,
Nor willing to forsake this pleasant land. Denham.

DISOBLIGA'TION, dĭs-ŏb-lē-gā'shŭn. n. s [dis and obligation.] Offence; cause of disgust.

If he receded from what he had promised, it would be such a disobligation to the prince that he would never forget it. Clarendon.

There can be no malice, and consequently no crime or disobligation. L'Estrange.

To DISOBLI'GE, dĭs-ō-blīje, or dĭs-ō-blēēje'. v. a. [dis and oblige.] To offend; to disgust; to give offence to. A term by which offence is tenderly expressed.

Ashley had been removed from that charge, and was thereby so much disobliged, that he quitted the king's party. Clarendon.

Those, though in highest place, who slight and disoblige their friends, shall infallibly come to know the value of them, by having none when they shall most need them. South.

It is in the power of more particular persons in this kingdom, than in any other, to distress the government, when they are disobliged. Addison.

My plan has given offence to some gentlemen, whom it would not be very safe to disoblige. Addison.

We love and esteem our clergy, and are apt to lay some weight upon their opinion, and would not willingly disoblige them. Swift.

If a woman suffers her lover to see she is loth to disoblige him, let her beware of an encroacher. Clarissa.

DISOBLI'GING, dĭs-ō-blī'jing.[411] participial adj. [from disoblige.] Disgusting; unpleasing; offensive

Would I had been disposer of thy stars,
Thou shouldst have had thy wish, and died in wars. Dryden.

3. One who takes from, and gives to, whom he pleases.

But brandish'd high, in an ill omen'd hour,
To thee, proud Gaul, behold thy justest fear,
The master sword, disposer of thy pow'r. Prior.

DISPOSI'TION, dis-pô-zîsh'ûn. n. s. [from dispositio, Lat.]

1. Order; method; distribution.

Touching musical harmony, whether by instrument or voice, it being of high and low, in due proportionable disposition, such notwithstanding is the force thereof, and so very pleasing effects it hath, in that very part of man which is most divine, that some have been thereby induced to think, that the soul itself by nature is, or hath in it, harmony. Hooker.

Under this head of invention is placed the disposition of the work, to put all things in a beautiful order and harmony, that the whole may be of a piece. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

I ask whether the connection of the extremes be not more clearly seen, in this simple and natural disposition, than in the perplexed repetitions and jumble of five or six syllogisms. Locke.

2. Natural fitness; quality.

Refrangibility of the rays of light is their disposition to be refracted, or turned out of their way, in passing out of one transparent body or medium into another. Newton.

3. Tendency to any act or state.

This argueth a great disposition to putrefaction, in the soil and air. Bacon.

Disposition is when the power and ability of doing any thing is forward, and ready upon every occasion to break into action. Locke.

Bleeding is to be used or omitted according to the symptoms which affect the brain: it relieves in any inflammatory disposition of the coat of the nerve. Arbuthnot on Diet.

4. Temper of mind.

I have suffered more for their sakes, more than the villanous inconstancy of man's disposition is able to bear. Shaksp.

Lesser had been
The thwartings of your disposition, if
You had not shew'd them how you were dispos'd,
Ere they lack'd power to cross you. Shaksp.

5. Affection of kindness or ill will.

I take myself to be as well informed as most men in the dispositions of each people towards the other. Swift.

6. Predominant inclination.

As they pinch one another by the disposition, he cries out, no more. Shaksp.

The love we bear to our friends is generally caused by our finding the same disposition in them which we feel in ourselves. Pope.

7. Assortment; adjustment of external circumstances: not used.

I crave fit disposition for my wife,
Due reference of place and exhibition,
As levels with her breeding. Shakspeare's Othello.

DISPO'SITIVE, dis-pôz'ê-tîv. adj. [from dispose.] That implies disposal of any property; decretive.

Not to affect many proposed matches
Of her own clime, complexion, and degree,
Whereto we see in all things nature tends;
Foh! one may smell, in such, a will most rank,
Foul disproportion; thoughts unnatural. Shak.

Reasoning, I oft admire
How nature wise and frugal, could commit
Such disproportions; with superfluous hand
So many nobler bodies to create,
Greater, so many fold, to this one use. Milton.

Perhaps from greatness, state and pride,
Thus surprised, she may fall;
Sleep does disproportion hide,
And, death resembling, equals all. Waller.

For their strength,
The disproportion is so great, we cannot but Expect a fatal consequence. Denham.

What did the liquid to th' assembly call,
To give their aid to form the pond'rous ball?
First tell us, why did any come? next, why
In such a disproportion to the dry? Blackmore.

That we are designed for a more exalted happiness than can be derived from the things of this life, we may infer from their vast disproportion to the desires and capacities of our soul. Rogers.

To DISPROPO'RTION, dis-prō-pōr'shŭn. v. a. [from the noun.] To mismatch; to join things unsuitable in quantity or form; to join unfitly.

There sits deformity to mock my body,
To shape my legs of an unequal size,
To disproportion me in every part. Shaksp.

Distance and men's fears have so enlarged the truth, and so disproportioned every thing, that we have made the little troop of discontents a gallant army, and already measured by the evening shadow. Suckling.

Music craveth your acquaintance: many are of such disproportioned spirits, that they avoid her company. Peacham.

We on earth, with undiscording voice,
May rightly answer that melodious noise;
As once we did, till disproportion'd sin
Jarr'd against nature's chime. Milton.

DISPROPO'RTIONABLE, dis-prō-pōr'shŭn-ā-bl. adj. [from disproportion.] Unsuitable in form or quantity; not duly regulated in regard to something else.

Doubts and fears are the sharpest passions: through these false opticks all that you see is like the evening shadows, disproportionable to the truth, and strangely longer than the true substance. Suckling.

Had the obliquity been greater, the earth had not been able to endure the disproportionable differences of season. Brown.

We are apt to set too great a value on temporal blessings, and have too low and disproportionable esteem of spiritual. Smalridge.

There is no wine of so strong a body as to bear such a disproportionable quantity of water as sixty parts. Broome.

Tempestuous fell
His arrows from the fourfold-visag'd four,
Distinct with eyes; and from the living wheels
Distinct alike with multitude of eyes. Milton.

5. Marked out; specified.

Dominion hold
Over all living things that move on th' earth,
Wherever thus created, for no place
Is yet distinct by name. Milton.

DISTI'NCTION, dîs-tînk'shûn. n. s. [distinctio, Latin.]

1. The act of discerning one as preferable to the other.

In the wind and tempest of fortune's frown,
Distinction, with a broad and powerful fan,
Puffing at all, winnows the light away. Shakspeare.

2. Note of difference.

3. Honourable note of superiority.

4. That by which one differs from another.

This faculty of perception puts the distinction betwixt the animal kingdom and the inferior parts of matter. Locke.

5. Difference regarded; preference or neglect in comparison with something else.

Maids, women, wives, without distinction fall,
The sweeping deluge, love, comes on and covers all. Dryden.

6. Separation of complex notions.

This fierce abridgment
Hath to it circumstantial branches, which Distinction should be rich in. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

7. Division into different parts.

The distinction of tragedy into acts was not known; or, if it were, it is yet so darkly delivered to us, that we cannot make it out. Dryden.

8. Notation of difference between things seemingly the same; discrimination.

The mixture of those things by speech, which by nature are divided, is the mother of all error; to take away therefore that error, which confusion breedeth, distinction is requisite. Hooker.

Lawfulness cannot be handled without limitations and distinctions. Bacon's Holy War.

This will puzzle all your logick and distinction to answer it. Denham's Sophy.

From this distinction of real and apparent good, some distinguish happiness into two sorts, real and imaginary. Norris.

9. Discernment; judgment.

DISTI'NCTIVE, dîs-tînk'tîv. adj. [from distinct.]

1. That marks distinction or difference.

For from the natal hour, distinctive names,
One common right, the great and lowly claims. Pope's Odyssey.

2. Having the power to distinguish and discern; judicious.

Credulous and vulgar auditors readily believe it, and the more judicious and distinctive heads do not reject it. Brown.

DISTI'NCTIVELY, dîs-tînk'tîv-lê. adv. [from distinctive.] Particularly; not confusedly.

I did all my pilgrimage dilate,
Whereof by parcels she had something heard,
But not distinctively. Shakspeare's Othello.

DISTI'NCTLY, dîs-tînkt'lê. adv. [from distinct.]

1. Not confusedly; without the confusion of one part with another.

To make an echo that will report three, or four, or five words distinctly, it is requisite that the body percussing be a good distance off. Bacon.

On its sides it was bounded pretty distinctly, but on its ends very confusedly and indistinctly. Newton's Opticks.

2. Plainly; clearly.

The object I could first distinctly view,
Was tall straight trees, which on the waters flew. Dryden.

After the light of the sun was a little worn off my eyes, I could see all the parts of it distinctly by a glimmering reflection that played upon them from the surface of the water. Addison.

DISTI'NCTNESS, dîs-tînkt'nês. n. s. [from distinct.]

1. Nice observation of the difference between different things

The membranes and humours of the eye are perfectly pellucid, and void of colour, for the clearness, and for the distinctness, of vision. Ray on the Crea.

2. Such discrimination of things as makes them easy to be observed.

To DISTI'NGUISH, dîs-ting'gwish.[340] v. a. [distinguo, Latin.]

1. To note the diversity of things.

Rightly to distinguish is, by conceit of the mind, to sever things different in nature, and to discern wherein they differ. Hooker.

2. To separate from others by some mark of honour or preference.

They distinguish my poems from those of other men, and have made me their peculiar care. Dryden.

Let us revolve that roll with strictest eye,
Where, safe from time, distinguish'd actions lie. Prior.

3. To divide by proper notes of diversity.

Moses distinguishes the causes of the flood into those that belong to the heavens, and those that belong to the earth, the rains, and the abyss. Burnet.

4. To know one from another by any mark or note of difference.

So long
As he could make me, with his eye or ear,
Distinguish him from others, he did keep
The deck. Shakspeare's Cymbeline.

We have not yet been seen in any house,
Nor can we be distinguish'd, by our faces,
For man or master. Shakspeare.

By our reason we are enabled to distinguish good from evil, as well as truth from falsehood. Watts.

5. To discern critically; to judge.

Sweet prince, th' untainted virtue of your years
Hath not yet div'd into the world's deceit,
Nor more can you distinguish of a man,
Than of his outward shew. Shakspeare.

6. To constitute difference; to specificate; to make different from another.

St. Paul's Epistles contain nothing but points of christian instruction, amongst which he seldom fails to enlarge on the great and distinguishing doctrines of our holy religion. Locke.

7. To make known or eminent.

To DISTI'NGUISH, dis-ting'gwish. v. n. To make distinction; to find or shew the difference.

He would warily distinguish between the profit of the merchant and the gain of the kingdom. Child's Discourse on Trade.

DISTI'NGUISHABLE, dis-ting'gwish-â-bl. adj. [from distinguish.]

1. Capable of being distinguished; capable of being known, or made known, by notes of diversity.

Impenitent, they left a race behind
Like to themselves, distinguishable scarce
From gentiles, but by circumcision vain. Milton.

The acting of the soul, as it relates to perception and decision, to choice and pursuit, or aversion, is distinguishable to us. Hale.

I shall distribute duty into its principal and eminent parts, distinguishable as they relate to God, our neighbour, and ourselves. Govern. of the Tongue.

Being dissolved in aqueous juices, it is by the eye distinguishable from the solvent body. Boyle.

A simple idea, being in itself uncompounded, contains nothing but one uniform appearance, or conception in the mind, and is not distinguishable into different ideas. Locke.

2. Worthy of note; worthy of regard.

I would endeavour that my betters should seek me by the merit of something distinguishable, instead of my seeking them. Swift.

DISTI'NGUISHED, dis-ting'gwisht.[359] participial adj. [from distinguish.] Eminent; transcendent; extraordinary.

For sins committed, with many aggravations of guilt, the furnace of wrath will be seven times hotter, and burn with a distinguished fury. Rogers.

Never on man did heav'nly favour shine,
With rays so strong, distinguish'd, and divine. Pope.

DISTI'NGUISHER, dis-twing'gwish-ûr. n. s. [from distinguish.]

1. A judicious observer; one that accurately discerns one thing from another.

If writers be just to the memory of Charles II. they cannot deny him to have been an exact knower of mankind, and a perfect distinguisher of their talents. Dryden.

2. He that separates one thing from another by proper marks of diversity.

Let us admire the wisdom of God in this distinguisher of times, and visible deity, the sun. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

DISTI'NGUISHINGLY, dis-ting'gwish-ing-lè. adv. [from distinguishing.] With distinction; with some mark of eminent preference.

Some call me a Tory, because the heads of that party have been distinguishingly favourable to me. Pope.

DISTI'NGUISHMENT, dis-ting'gwish-mênt. n. s. [from distinguish.] Distinction; observation of difference.

To make corrections upon the searchers reports, I consider whether any credit at all were to be given to their distinguishments. Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

To DISTO'RT, dis-tôrt'. v. a. [distortus, Lat.]

1. To writhe; to twist; to deform by irregular motions.

I see her taste each nauseous draught,
And so obligingly am caught,
I bless the hand from whence they came,
Nor dare distort my face for shame. Swift.

Now mortal pangs distort his lovely form. Smith.

2. To put out of the true direction or posture.

With fear and pain
Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew Transform'd. Milton.

Wrath and malice, envy and revenge do darken and distort the understandings of men. Tillotson.

3. To wrest from the true meaning.

Something must be distorted beside the intent of the divine inditer. Peacham on Poetry.

DISTO'RTION, dis-tôr'shûn. n. s. [distortio, Lat.] Irregular motion by which the face is writhed, or the parts disordered.

By his distortions he reveals his pains;
He by his tears and by his sighs complains. Prior.

In England we see people lulled asleep with solid and elaborate discourses of piety, who would be warmed and transported out of themselves by the bellowings and distortions of enthusiasm. Addison.

To DISTRA'CT, dis-trâkt'. v. a. part. pass. distracted; anciently distraught; and sometimes distract. [distractus, Lat.]

1. To pull different ways at once.

The needle endeavours to conform unto the meridian; but, being distracted, driveth that way where the greater and powerfuller part of the earth is placed. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

2. To separate; to divide.

By sea, by sea.
—Most worthy sir, you therein throw away
The absolute soldiership you have by land;
Distract your army, which doth most consist
Of war-mark'd footmen. Shaksp.

3. To turn from a single direction toward various points.

If he cannot wholly avoid the eye of the observer, he hopes to distract it by a multiplicity of the object. South.

4. To fill the mind with contrary considerations; to perplex; to confound; to harass.

While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted. Psalm.

Come, cousin, canst thou quake and change thy colour,
Murder thy breath in middle of a word,
And then again begin, and stop again,
As if thou wert distraught and mad with terror?
Shakspeare's Richard III

It would burst forth; but I recover breath,
And sense distract to know well what I utter.
Milton's Agonistes

He possesses a quiet and cheerful mind, not afflicted with violent passions, or distracted with immoderate cares. Ray.

If our sense of hearing were a thousand times quicker than it is, how would a perpetual noise distract us! We should, in the quietest retirement, be less able to sleep or meditate than in the middle of a sea-fight. Locke.

5. To make mad: properly, by an unsettled and vagrant fancy; but, popularly, to make mad in whatever mode.

Wherefore throng you hither?—
—To fetch my poor distracted husband hence:
Let us come in, that we may bind him fast,
And bear him home for his recovery. Shaksp.

Better I was distract,
So should my thoughts be severed from my griefs,
And woes, by wrong imagination, lose
The knowledge of themselves. Shaksp.

She was unable in strength of mind to bear the grief of his disease, and fell distracted of her wits. Bacon.

You shall find a distracted man fancy himself a king, and with a right inference require suitable attendance, respect, and obedience. Locke.

DISTRA'CTEDLY, dis-trâk'têd-lè. adv. [from distract.] Madly; frantickly.

Methought her eyes had cross'd her tongue;
For she did speak in starts distractedly. Shaksp.

DISTRA'CTEDNESS, dis-trâk'têd-nês. n. s. [from distract.] The state of being distracted; madness.

DISTRA'CTION, dis-trâk'shûn. n. s. [distractio, Lat.]

While he was yet in Rome,
His power went out in such distractions, as Beguil'd all spies. Shakspeare's Ant. and Cleop.

2. Confusion; state in which the attention is called different ways.

Never was known a night of such distraction,
Noise so confus'd and dreadful; jostling crowds,
That run and knew not whither. Dryden.

What may we not hope from him in a time of quiet and tranquillity, since, during the late distractions, he has done so much for the advantage of our trade? Addison's Freeholder.

3. Perturbation of mind; violence of some painful passion.

The irascible passions follow the temper of the heart; the concupiscible distractions, the crasis of the liver. Brown.

The distraction of the children, who saw both their parents expiring together, would have melted the hardest heart. Tatler.

4. Madness; frantickness; loss of the wits; vagrancy of the mind.

Madam, this is a meer distraction:
You turn the good we offer into envy. Shaksp.

So to mad Pentheus double Thebes appears,
And furies howl in his distemper'd ears:
Orestes so, with like distraction tost,
Is made to fly his mother's angry ghost. Waller.

Commiserate all those who labour under a settled distraction, and who are shut out from all the pleasures and advantages of human commerce. Atterbury.

5. Disturbance; discord; difference of sentiments.

The two armies lay quiet near each other, without improving the confusion and distraction which the king's forces were too much inclined to. Clarendon.

DISTRA'CTIVE, dis-trâk'tiv. adj. [from

Swift to the queen the herald Medon ran,
Who heard the consult of the dire divan. Pope.

To DIVA'RICATE, di-vâr'ê-kâte.[123] v. n. [divaricatus, Lat.] To be parted into two; to become bifid.

The partitions are strained across: one of them divaricates into two, and another into several small ones. Woodward.

To DIVA'RICATE, di-vâr'ê-kâte. v. a. To divide into two.

A slender pipe is produced forward towards the throat, whereinto it is at last inserted, and is there divaricated, after the same manner as the spermatick vessels. Grew.

DIVARICA'TION, dê-vâr-ê-kâ'shûn. n. s. [divaricatio, Lat.]

1. Partition into two.

Dogs, running before their masters, will stop at a divarication of the way, till they see which hand their masters will take. Ray.

2. Division of opinions.

To take away all doubt, or any probable divarication, the curse is plainly specified. Brown.

To DIVE, dive. v. n. [dippan, Saxon.]

1. To sink voluntarily under water.

I am not yet informed, whether when a diver diveth, having his eyes open, and swimmeth upon his back, he sees things in the air greater or less. Bacon.

Around our pole the spiry dragon glides,
And like a winding stream, the bears divides,
The less and greater; who, by fate's decree,
Abhor to dive beneath the southern sea. Dryden.

That the air in the blood-vessels of live bodies has a communication with the outward air, I think, seems plain from the experiments of human creatures being able to bear air of much greater density in diving, and of much less upon the tops of mountains, provided the changes be made gradually. Arbuthnot.

2. To go under water in search of any thing.

Crocodiles defend those pearls which lie in the lakes: the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearl. Raleigh.

The knave deserves it, when he tempts the main,
Where folly fights for kings, or dives for gain. Pope.

3. To go deep into any question, doctrine, or science.

The wits that div'd most deep, and soar'd most high,
Seeking man's pow'rs, have found his weakness such. Davies.

He performs all this out of his own fund, without diving into the arts and sciences for a supply. Dryden.

Whensoever we would proceed beyond those simple ideas, and dive farther into the nature of things, we fall presently into darkness and obscurity. Locke.

You swim a-top, and on the surface strive;
But to the depths of nature never dive. Blackmore.

You should have div'd into my inmost thoughts. Philips.

4. To immerge into any business or condition.

Sweet prince, th' untainted virtue of your years
Hath not yet div'd into the world's deceit,
Nor can distinguish. Shaksp.

5. To depart from observation; to sink.

Dive, thoughts, down to my soul. Shaksp.

To DIVE, dive. v. a. To explore by diving.

Then Brutus, Rome's first martyr, I must name;
The Curtii bravely div'd the gulf of fame. Denham.

To DIVE'LL, di-vêl'. v. a. [divello, Lat.] To pull; to separate; to sever.

They begin to separate, and may be easily divelled or parted asunder. Brown.

DI'VER, di'vûr. n. s. [from dive.]

1. One that sinks voluntarily under water.

Perseverance gains the diver's prize. Pope.

2. One that goes under water in search of treasure.

It is evident, from the relation of divers and fishers for pearls, that there are many kinds of shell-fish which lie perpetually concealed in the deep, skreened from our sight. Woodward.

3. He that enters deep into knowledge or study.

He would have him, as I conceive it, to be no superficial and floating artificer; but a diver into causes, and into the mysteries of proportion. Wotton.

To DIVE'RGE, dê-vêrje'.[124] v. n. [divergo, Lat.] To tend various ways from one point.

Homogeneal rays, which flow from several points of any object and fall perpendicularly on any reflecting surface, shall afterwards diverge from so many points. Newton.

DIVE'RGENT, dê-vêr'jênt.[124] adj. [from divergens, Lat.] Tending to various parts from one point.

DI'VERS, di'vêrz. adj. [diversus, Lat.] Several; sundry; more than one. Out of use.

We have divers examples in the church of such as, by fear, being compelled to sacrifice to strange gods, repented, and kept still the office of preaching the gospel. Whitgift.

The teeth breed when the child is a year and a half old: then they cast them, and new ones come about seven years; but divers have backward teeth come at twenty, some at thirty and forty. Bacon.

Divers letters were shot into the city with arrows, wherein Solyman's councils were revealed. Knolles.

Divers friends thought it strange, that a white dry body should acquire a rich colour upon the affusion of spring water. Boyle.

DI'VERSE, di'vêrse. adj. [diversus, Lat.]

1. Different from another.

Four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another. Daniel.

2. Different from itself; various; multiform; diffused.

Eloquence is a great and diverse thing, nor did she yet ever favour any man so much as to be wholly his. Ben Jonson.

3. In different directions. It is little used but in the last sense.

The gourd
And thirsty cucumber, when they perceive
Th' approaching olive, with resentment fly
Her fatty fibres, and with tendrils creep
Diverse, detesting contact. Philips.

To seize his papers, Curl, was next thy care;
His papers light fly diverse, tost in air. Pope.

DIVERSIFICA'TION, dê-vêr-sê-fê-kâ'shûn. n. s. [from diversify.]

1. The act of changing forms or qualities.

If you consider how variously several things may be compounded, you will not wonder that such fruitful principles, or manners of diversification, should generate differing colours. Boyle.

2. Variation; variegation.

3. Variety of forms; multiformity.

4. Change; alteration.

This, which is here called a change of will, is not a change of his will, but a change in the object, which seems to make a diversification of the will, but indeed is the same will diversified. Hale.

To DIVE'RSIFY, dê-vêr'sê-fi. v. a. [diversifier, Fr.]

1. To make different from another; to distinguish; to discriminate.

There may be many species of spirits, as much separated and diversified one from another, as the species of sensible things are distinguished one from another. Locke.

Male souls are diversified with so many characters, that the world has not variety of materials sufficient to furnish out their different inclinations. Addison.

It was easier for Homer to find proper sentiments for Grecian generals, than for Milton to diversify his infernal council with proper characters. Addison.

2. To make different from itself; to vary; to variegate.

The country being diversified between hills and dales, woods and plains, one place more clear, another more darksome, it is a pleasant picture. Sidney.

There is, in the producing of some species, a composition of matter, which may be much diversified. Bacon.

DIVE'RSION, dê-vêr'shûn.[124] n. s. [from divert.]

1. The act of turning any thing off from its course.

Cutting off the tops, and pulling off the buds, work retention of the sap for a time, and diversion of it to the sprouts that were not forward. Bacon.

I have ranked this diversion of christian practice among the effects of our contentions. Decay of Piety.

2. The cause by which any thing is turned from its proper course or tendency.

Fortunes, honour, friends,
Are mere diversions from love's proper object,
Which only is itself. Denham.

3. Sport; something that unbends the mind by turning it off from care. Diversion seems to be something lighter than amusement, and less forcible than pleasure.

You for those ends whole days in councils sit,
And the diversions of your youth forget. Waller.

In the book of games and diversions, the reader's mind may be supposed to be relaxed. Addison.

Such productions of wit and humour as expose vice and folly, furnish useful diversions to readers. Addison.

4. [In war.] The act or purpose of drawing the enemy off from some design, by threatening or attacking a distant part.

DIVE'RSITY, dê-vêr'sê-tê. n. s. [diversité, Fr. from diversitas, Lat.]

1. Difference; dissimilitude; unlikeness.

Then is there in this diversity no contrariety. Hooker.

They cannot be divided, but they will prove opposite; and not resting in a bare diversity, rise into a contrariety. South.

The most common diversity of human constitutions arises from the solid parts, as to their different degrees of strength and tension. Arbuthnot.

2. Variety.

The diversity of ceremonies in this kind ought not to cause dissension in churches. Hooker.

Society cannot subsist without a diversity of stations; and if God should grant every one a middle station, he would defeat the very scheme of happiness proposed in it. Rogers.

3. Distinct being; not identity.

Considering any thing as existing at any determined time and place, we compare it with itself existing at another time, and thereon form the ideas of identity and diversity. Locke.

4. Variegation.

A waving glow his bloomy beds display,
Blushing in bright diversities of day. Pope.

DI'VERSLY, di'vêrs-lê. adv. [from diverse.]

1. In different ways; differently; variously.

The lack we all have, as well of ghostly as of earthly favours, is in each kind easily known; but the gifts of God are so diversly bestowed, that it seldom appeareth what all receive: what all stand in need of seldom lieth hid. Hooker.

Both of them do diversly work, as they have their medium diversly disposed. Bacon.

Whether the king did permit it to save his purse, or to communicate the envy of a business displeasing to his people, was diversly interpreted. Bacon.

Leicester bewrayed a desire to plant him in the queen's favour, which was diversly interpreted by such as thought that great artizan of courts to do nothing by chance, nor much by affection. Wotton.

The universal matter, which Moses comprehendeth under the names of heaven and earth, is by divers diversly understood. Raleigh.

William's arm
Could nought avail, however fam'd in war;
Nor armies leagu'd, that diversly assay'd
To curb his power. Philips.

2. In different directions; to different points.

On life's vast ocean diversly we sail;
Reason the card, but passion is the gale. Pope.

To DIVE'RT, dė-vêrt'[124] v. a. [diverto, Lat.]

1. To turn off from any direction or course.

I rather will subject me to the malice
Of a diverted blood and bloody brother. Shaksp.

Knots, by the conflux of the meeting sap,
Infect the sound pine, and divert his grain,
Tortive and errant, from his course of growth. Shaksp.

He finds no reason to have his rent abated, because a greater part of it is diverted from his landlord. Locke

They diverted raillery from improper objects, and gave a new turn to ridicule. Addison.

Nothing more is requisite for producing all the variety of colours, and degrees of refrangibility, than that the rays of light be bodies of different sizes; the least of which may make violet, the weakest and darkest of the colours, and be more easily diverted by refracting surfaces from the right course; and the rest, as they are bigger and bigger, make the stronger and more lucid colours, blue, green, yellow, and red, and be more and more difficultly diverted. Newton.

2. To draw forces to a different part.

The kings of England would have had an absolute conquest of Ireland, if their whole power had been employed; but still there arose sundry occasions, which divided and diverted their power some other way. Davies.

3. To withdraw the mind.

Alas, how simple, to these cates compar'd,
Was that crude apple that diverted Eve! Milton

They avoided pleasure, lest they should have their affections tainted by any sensuality, and diverted from the love of him who is to be the only comfort. Addison.

Maro's muse, not wholly bent
On what is gainful, sometimes she diverts
From solid counsel. Philips.

4. To please; to exhilarate. See DIVERSION.

An ingenious gentleman did divert or instruct the kingdom by his papers. Swift.

5. To subvert; to destroy; in Shakspeare, unless it belong to the first sense.

Frights, changes, horrours,
Divert and crack, rend and deracinate
The unity and married calm of states. Shaksp.

DIVE'RTER, dė-vêr'tûr. n. s. [from the verb.] Any thing that diverts or alleviates.

Angling was, after tedious study, a rest to his mind, a cheerer of his spirits, and a diverter of sadness. Walton.

To DIVERTI'SE, dė-vêr'tiz. v. a. [divertiser, Fr. diverto, Lat.] To please; to exhilarate; to divert. Little used.

Let orators instruct, let them divertise, and let them move us: this is what is properly meant by the word salt. Dryden.

DIVE'RTISEMENT, dė-vêr'tiz-mėnt. n. s. [divertissement, Fr.] Diversion; delight; pleasure. Not much in use.

How fond soever men are of bad divertisement, it will prove mirth which ends in heaviness. Gov. of the Tongue.

DIVE'RTIVE, dė-vêr'tiv. adj. [from divert.] Recreative; amusive; exhilarating. A word not fully authorized.

I would not exclude the common accidents of life, nor even things of a pleasant and divertive nature, so they are innocent, from conversation. Rogers.

To DIVE'ST, dė-vêst'.[124] v. a. [devestir, Fr. The English word is therefore more properly written devest. See DEVEST.] To strip; to make naked; to denude.

Then of his arms Androgeus he divests;
His sword, his shield, he takes, and plumed crests. Denham.

Let us divest the gay phantom of temporal happiness of all that false lustre and ornament in which the pride, the passions, and the folly of men have dressed it up. Rogers.

DIVE'STURE, dė-vês'tshûre. n. s. [from divest.] The act of putting off.

The divesture of mortality dispenses them from those laborious and avocating duties which are here requisite to be performed. Boyle.

2. Excellence in the supreme degree.

By Jupiter, an angel! or, if not,
An earthly paragon: behold divineness
No elder than a boy. Shakspeare.

DIVI'NER, dê-vî'nûr.[98] n. s. [from To divine.]

1. One that professes divination, or the art of revealing occult things by supernatural means.

This drudge of the devil, this diviner, laid claim to me, called me Dromio, and swore I was assured to her; told me what privy marks I had about me. Shakspeare.

Expelled his oracles, and common temples of delusion, the devil runs into corners, exercising meaner trumperies, and acting his deceits in witches, magicians, diviners, and such inferior seducers. Brown's Vulgar Errours.

2. Conjecturer; guesser.

If he himself be conscious of nothing he then thought on, he must be a notable diviner of thoughts, that can assure him that he was thinking. Locke.

DIVI'NERESS, dê-vîne'rês. n. s. [from diviner.] A prophetess; a woman professing divination.

The mad divineress had plainly writ,
A time should come, but many ages yet,
In which sinister destinies ordain
A dame should drown with all her feather'd train. Dryden.

DIVI'NITY, dê-vîn'ê-tê.[511] n. s. [divinité, Fr. divinitas, Lat.]

1. Participation of the nature and excellence of God; deity; godhead.

As with new wine intoxicated both,
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
Divinity within them breeding wings,
Wherewith to scorn the earth. Milton.

When he attributes divinity to other things than God, it is only a divinity by way of participation. Stillingfleet.

2. God; the Deity; the supreme Being; the Cause of causes.

'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us,
'Tis Heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man. Addison.

3. False god.

Vain idols, deities that ne'er before
In Israel's lands had fix'd their dire abodes,
Beastly divinities, and droves of gods. Prior.

4. Celestial being.

God doubtless can govern this machine he could create, by more direct and easy methods than employing these subservient divinities. Cheyne.

5. The science of divine things; theology.

Hear him but reason in divinity,
And, all admiring, with an inward wish
You would desire the king were made a prelate. Shakspeare.

Trust not my age,
My reverence, calling, nor divinity,
If this sweet lady lie not guiltless here
Under some biting errour. Shakspeare.

Among hard words I number those which are peculiar to divinity, as it is a science. Swift.

6. Something supernatural.

They say there is divinity in odd numbers, either in nativity, chance, or death. Shakspeare.

DIVI'SIBLE, dê-vîz'ê-bl.[124] adj. [divisibilis, Latin.] Capable of being divided into parts; discerptible; separable.

When we frame in our minds any notion of matter, we conceive nothing else but extension and bulk, which is impenetrable, or divisible and passive. Bentley.

DIVISIBI'LITY, dê-vîz-ê-bîl'ê-tê. n. s. [divisibilité, Fr.] The quality of admitting division or separation of parts.

1. The legal separation of husband and wife.

Divorce is a lawful separation of husband and wife, made before a competent judge, on due cognizance had of the cause, and sufficient proof made thereof. Ayliffe's Parergon.

To restore the king,
He counsels a divorce, a loss of her,
That like a jewel has hung twenty years
About his neck, yet never lost her lustre. Shaks. Henry VIII.

He had in his eye the divorce which had passed betwixt the emperor and Scribonia. Dryden.

2. Separation; disunion.

Such motions may occasion a farther alienation of mind, and divorce of affections, in her, from my religion. King Charles.

These things, to be a bastard, and to be born out of lawful wedlock, are convertible the one with the other; and 'tis hard to make divorce between those things that are so near in nature to each other, as being convertible terms. Ayliffe.

3. The sentence by which a marriage is dissolved.

4. The cause of any penal separation.

Go with me, like good angels, to my end;
And, as the long divorce of steel falls on me,
Make of your prayers one sweet sacrifice,
And lift my soul to heav'n. Shaks.

To DIVO'RCE, dė-vôrse'.[124] v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To separate a husband or wife from the other.

2. To force asunder; to separate by violence.

Were it consonant unto reason to divorce these two sentences, the former of which doth shew how the latter is restrained, and, not marking the former, to conclude by the latter of them? Hooker.

The continent and the island were continued together, within men's remembrance, by a drawbridge: but are now divorced by the downfallen cliffs. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

So seem'd her youthful soul not eas'ly forc'd,
Or from so fair, so sweet a seat divorc'd. Waller.

3. To separate from another.

If thou wert not glad,
I would divorce me from thy mother's tomb,
Sepulch'ring on adultress. Shaks.

If so be it were possible, that all other ornaments of mind might be had in their full perfection, nevertheless the mind that should possess them, divorced from piety, could be but a spectacle of commiseration. Hooker.

4. To take away; to put away.

I dare not make myself so guilty,
To give up willingly that noble title
Your master wed me to: nothing but death
Shall e'er divorce my dignities. Shaks.

Aërial pasture the lungs with gentle force
Constant embrace by turns, by turns divorce.
Blackmore.

To Doat, dôte. v. n. See To Dote.

DO'CIBLE, dô'sê-bl.[405] adj. [docilis, Lat.] Tractable; docile; easy to be taught.

The asinine feast of sow-thistles and brambles is commonly set before them, as all the food and entertainment of their tenderest and most docible age. Milton.

Do'CIBLENESS, dô'sê-bl-nês. n. s. [from docible.] Teachableness; docility; readiness to learn.

I might enlarge in commendation of the noble hound, as also of the docibleness of dogs in general. Walton.

DO'CILE, dôs'sîl.[140] adj. [docilis, Lat.]

1. Teachable; easily instructed; tractable.

Dogs soon grow accustomed to whatever they are taught, and, being docile and tractable, are very useful. Ellis' Voyage.

2. With to before the thing taught.

Soon docile to the secret acts of ill,
With smiles I could betray, with temper kill. Prior.

Doci'LITY, dô-sîl'lê-tê. n. s. [docilité, Fr. from docilitas, Lat.] Aptness to be taught; readiness to learn.

All the perfection they allowed his understanding was aptness and docility, and all that they attributed to his will was a possibility to be virtuous. South.

What is more admirable than the fitness of every creature for use? the docility of an elephant, and the insitiency of a camel for travelling in desarts? Grew.

DOCK, dôk. n. s. [ɒocca, Sax.] A plant; a weed.

The species are seventeen, ten of which grow wild, several of them being used in medicine; and the sort called the oriental burdock, is said to be the true rhubarb. Miller.

Nothing teems
But hateful docks, rough thistles, kecksies, burs,
Losing both beauty and utility. Shakspeare.

My love for gentle Dermot faster grows
Than yon tall dock that rises to thy nose:
Cut down the dock, 'twill sprout again; but know,
Love rooted out, again will never grow. Swift.

DOCK, dôk. n. s.

1. The stump of the tail, which remains after docking.

2. The solid part of the tail.

The tail of a great rhinoceros is not well described by Bontius. The dock is about half an inch thick, and two inches broad, like an apothecary's spatula. Grew.

Dock, dôk. n. s. [as some imagine, of δοχεῖον.] A place where water is let in or out at pleasure, where ships are built or laid up.

The boatswain and mariner may bring religion to what dock they please. Howel.

There are docks for their gallies and men of war, as well as work-houses for all land and naval preparations. Addison.

To Dock, dôk. v. a. [from dock, a tail.]

1. To cut off a tail.

2. To cut any thing short.

One or two stood constant centry, who docked all favours handed down; and spread a huge invisible net between the prince and subject, through which nothing of value could pass. Swift.

3. To cut off a reckoning; to cut off an entail.

4. To lay the ship in a dock.

Do'CKET, dôk'ît.[99] n. s. A direction tied upon goods; a summary of a larger writing. Dict.

DO'CTOR, dôk'tûr.[166] n. s. [doctor, Lat.]

1. One that has taken the highest degree in the faculties of divinity, law, or physick. In some universities they have doctors of musick. In its original import, it means a man so well versed in his faculty, as to be qualified to teach it.

No woman had it, but a civil doctor,
Who did refuse three thousand ducats of me,
And begg'd the ring. Shakspeare.

Then stood there up one in the council, a pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of laws. Acts.

2. A man skilled in any profession.

Then subtle doctors scriptures made their pride,
Casuists, like cocks, struck out each others eyes. Denham.

Each proselyte would vote his doctor best,
With absolute exclusion to the rest. Dryden.

3. A physician; one who undertakes the cure of diseases.

By med'cine life may be prolong'd, yet death
Will seize the doctor too. Shakspeare.

How does your patient, doctor?—
—Not so sick, my lord,
As she is troubled with thick coming fancies. Shakspeare.

Children will not take those medicines from the doctor's hand, which they will from a nurse or mother. Government of the Tongue.

To 'pothecaries let the learn'd prescribe,
That men may die without a double bribe;
Let them, but under their superiours, kill,
When doctors first have sign'd the bloody bill. Dryden.

He that can cure by recreation, and make pleasure the vehicle of health, is a doctor at it in good earnest. Collier.

In truth, nine parts in ten of those who recovered, owed their lives to the strength of nature and a good constitution, while such a one happened to be the doctor. Swift.

4. Any able or learned man.

The simplest person that can but apprehend and speak sense, is as much judge of it as the greatest doctor in the school. Digby.

To Do'CTOR, dôk'tûr.[166] v. a. [from the noun.] To physick; to cure; to treat with medicines. A low word.

Do'CTORAL, dôk'tô-râl adj. [doctoralis, Lat.] Relating to the degree of a doctor.

DO'CTORALLY, dôk'tò-râl-è. adv. [from doctoral.] In manner of a doctor.

The physicians resorted to him to touch his pulse, and consider of his disease doctorally at their departure. Hakewill.

DO'CTORSHIP, dôk'tûr-shîp. n. s. [from doctor.] The rank of a doctor.

From a scholar he became a fellow, and then the president of the college, after he had received all the graces and degrees, the proctorship and the doctorship. Clarendon.

DO'CTRINAL, dôk'trè-nâl. adj. [doctrina, Lat.]

1. Containing doctrine, or something formally taught.

The verse naturally affords us the doctrinal proposition, which shall be our subject. South.

2. Pertaining to the act or means of teaching.

To this end the word of God no otherwise serveth, than only in the nature of a doctrinal instrument. Hooker.

What special property or quality is that, which, being no where found but in sermons, maketh them effectual to save souls, and leaveth all other doctrinal means besides destitute of vital efficacy? Hooker.

DOCTRI'NAL, dôk-trè'nâl. n. s. Something that is part of doctrine.

Not such as assent to every word in scripture, can be said in doctrinals to deny Christ. South.

DOCTRI'NALLY, dôk'trè-nâl-è. adv. [from doctrine.] In the form of doctrine; positively, as necessary to be held.

Scripture accommodates itself to common opinions, and employs the usual forms of speech, without delivering any thing doctrinally concerning these points. Ray.

DO'CTRINE, dôk'trîn.[140] n. s. [doctrina, Lat.]

1. The principles or positions of any sect or master; that which is taught.

To make new articles of faith and doctrine, no man thinketh it lawful: new laws of government, what church or commonwealth is there which maketh not, either at one time or other. Hooker.

Ye are the sons of clergy, who bring all their doctrines fairly to the light, and invite men with freedom to examine them. Atterbury.

That great principle in natural philosophy is the doctrine of gravitation, or mutual tendency of all bodies toward each other. Watts.

2. The act of teaching.

He said unto them in his doctrine. Mark.

DO'CUMENT, dôk'ù-mênt. n. s. [documentum, Lat.]

1. Precept; instruction; direction.

It is a most necessary instruction and document for them, that as her majesty made them dispensators of her favour, so it behoveth them to shew themselves equal distributors. Bacon.

Learners should not be too much crowded with a heap or multitude of documents or ideas at one time. Watts.

2. Precept, in an ill sense; a precept insolently authoritative, magisterially dogmatical, solemnly trifling.

Gentle insinuations pierce, as oil is the most penetrating of all liquors; but in magisterial documents men think themselves attacked, and stand upon their guard. Government of the Tongue.

It is not unnecessary to digest the documents of cracking authors into several classes. Harvey.

DO'DDER, dôd'dûr.[98] n. s. [touteren, to shoot up, Dutch. Skinner.]

Dodder is a singular plant: when it first shoots from the seed it has little roots, which pierce the earth near the roots of other plants; but the capillaments of which it is formed soon after clinging about these plants, the roots wither away. From this time it propagates itself along the stalks of the plant, entangling itself about them. It has no leaves, but consists of capillaments or stalks, brownish with a cast of red, which run to great lengths. They have tubercles, which fix them fast down to the plant, and by means of which they absorb the juices destined for its nourishment. Hill.

DO'DDERED, dôd'dûrd. adj. [from dodder.] Overgrown with dodder; covered with supercrescent plants.

Near the hearth a laurel grew,
Dodder'd with age, whose boughs encompass round
The household gods, and shade the holy ground.
Dryden.

The peasants were enjoin'd
Sere-wood, and firs, and dodder'd oaks to find.
Dryden.

DODE'CAGON, dò-dêk'â-gôn. n. s. [δωδεκα and γωνία.] A figure of twelve sides.

DODECATEMO'RION, dò-dè-kâ-tè-mò'rè-ôn. n. s. [δωδεκα]ημόριον.] The twelfth part.

'Tis dodecatemorion thus describ'd:
Thrice ten degrees, which every sign contains,
Let twelve exhaust, that not one part remains;
It follows streight, that every twelfth confines
Two whole and one half portion of the signs.
Creech.

To DODGE, dôdje. v. n. [probably corrupted from dog; to shift, and play sly tricks, like a dog.] The word in all its senses is low and vulgar.

1. To use craft; to deal with tergiversation; to play mean tricks; to use low shifts.

If in good offices and due retributions we may not be pinching and niggardly, it argues an earthly and ignoble mind, where we have apparently wronged, to higgle and dodge in the amends. Hale.

The consideration should make men grow weary of dodging and shewing tricks with God. South.

2. To shift place as another approaches.

For he had, any time these ten years full,
Dodg'd with him betwixt Cambridge and the Bull.
Milton.

3. To play fast and loose; to raise expectations and disappoint them.

You know my passion for Martha, and what a dance she has led me; she dodged with me above thirty years. Addison.

The chaffering with dissenters, and dodging about this or t'other ceremony, is but like opening a few wickets, and leaving them a-jar, by which no more than one can get in at a time. Swift.

DO'DKIN, dôd'kîn. n. s. [duytken, Dutch.] A doitkin, or little doit; a contemptuous name for a low coin.

I would not buy them for a dodkin. Lily.

DO'DMAN, dôd'mân.[88] n. s. The name of a fish.

Fish that cast their shell are the lobster, the crab, the craw-fish, the hodmandod, or dodman, and the tortoise. Bacon.

DOE, dò. n. s. [ᵹa, Saxon; daa, Danish; dama, Latin.] A she deer; the female of a buck.

Then but forbear your food a little while,
While, like a doe, I go to find my fawn,
And give it food. Shaks.

Bucks have horns, does none. Bacon.

The fearful doe
And flying stag amidst the greyhounds go. Dryden.

DOE, dò. n. s. [from To do.] A feat; what one has to do; what one can perform.

No sooner he does peep into
The world, but he has done his doe. Hudibras.

DO'ER, dòò'ûr.[298] n. s. [from To do.]

1. One that does any thing good or bad.

So foul a thing, O! thou injustice art,
That tort'rest both the doer and distrest. Daniel.

It may be indeed a public crime, or a national mischief; yet it is but a private act, and the doer of it may chance to pay his head for his presumption. South.

2. Actor; agent.

Sith thus far we open the things that have been done, let not the principal doers themselves be forgotten. Hooker.

3. Performer.

One judgeth the prize to the best doer, of which they are no less glad than great princes are of triumphs. Sidney.

4. An active, or busy, or valiant person.

Fear not, my lord, we will not stand to prate;
Talkers are no good doers: be assur'd,
We go to use our hands, and not our tongues. Shaks.

They are great speakers but small doers; greater in shew than in deed. Knolles.

5. One that habitually performs or practises.

Be doers of the word, and not hearers only. Common Prayer.

In this we shew ourselves weak, and unapt to be doers of his will, in that we take upon us to be controllers of his wisdom. Hooker.

DOES, dûz.[296] The third person from do, for doth.

Though lending to foreigners upon use, doth not at all alter the balance of trade between those countries, yet it does alter the exchange between those countries. Locke.

To DOFF, dôf. v. a. [from do off.] The word is in all its senses obsolete, and scarcely used except by rusticks; yet it is a pure and commodious word.

1. To put off dress.

You have deceiv'd our trust,
And made us doff our easy robes of peace,
To crush our old limbs in ungentle steel. Shaksp.

Doff those links. Milton.

Nature, in awe to him,
Had doff'd her gaudy trim,
With her great master so to sympathize. Milton.

That judge is hot, and doffs his gown. Dryden.

Alcides doffs the lion's tawny hide. Rowe.

2. To strip; to divest of any thing.

Why art thou troubled, Herod? What vain fear
Thy blood-revolving breast doth move?
Heav'n's king, who doffs himself our flesh to wear,
Comes not to rule in wrath, but serve in love.
Crashaw.

3. To put away; to get rid of.

Your eye in Scotland
Would create soldiers, and make women fight,
To doff their dire distresses. Shaksp.

4. To shift off; to delay; to refer to another time; to put off.

Every day thou doff'st me with some device, Iago; and rather keep'st from me all conveniency, than suppliest me with the least advantage of hope. Shaksp.

Away, I will not have to do with you.—
—Canst thou so doff me? Shaksp.

DOG, dôg. n. s. [dogghe, Dutch; canis, Lat.]

1. A domestick animal remarkably various in his species; comprising the mastiff, the spaniel, the bull-dog, the greyhound, the hound, the terrier, the cur, with many others. The larger sort are used as a guard; the less for sports.

Such smiling rogues as these sooth every passion:
Renege, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks

With ev'ry gale and vary of their masters,
As knowing naught, like dogs, but following. Shaksp.
Why should we not think a watch and pistol as distinct species one from another, as a horse and a dog. Locke.
The clamour roars of men, and boys and dogs. Thomson.

2. A constellation called Sirius, or Canicula, rising and setting with the sun during the canicular days, or dog-days.
Among the southern constellations, two there are who bear the name of the dog, the one in sixteen degrees latitude, containing on the left thigh a star of the first magnitude, usually called Procyon, or Anticanus. Brown.
It parts the twins and crab, the dog divides
And Argo's keel that broke the frothy tides. Creech.

3. A reproachful name for a man.
I never heard a passion so confus'd,
So strange, outrageous, and so variable,
As the dog Jew did utter in the streets. Shaksp.
Beware of dogs, beware of evil works. Philippians.

4. To give or send to the Dogs; to throw away. To go to the Dogs; to be ruined, destroyed, or devoured.
Had whole Colepeper's wealth been hops and hogs,
Could he himself have sent it to the dogs? Pope.

5. It is used as the term for the male of several species: as, the dog fox, the dog otter.
If ever I thank any man, I'll thank you: but that they call compliments is like the encounter of two dog apes. Shaksp.
The same ill taste of sense will serve to join
Dog foxes in the yoke, and sheer the swine. Dryden.

6. Dog is a particle added to any thing, to mark meanness, or degeneracy, or worthlessness: as, dog rose.

To Dog, dôg. v. a. [from the noun.] To hunt, as a dog, insidiously and indefatigably.
I have dogg'd him like his murtherer. Shaksp.
I, his despiteful Juno, sent him forth
From courtly friends, with camping foes to live,
Where death and danger dog the heels of worth. Shaksp.
Sorrow dogging sin,
Afflictions sorted. Herbert.
I fear the dread events that dog them both,
Lest some ill-greeting touch attempt the person
Of our renowned sister. Milton.
These spiritual joys are dogged by no sad sequels. Glanville.
I have been pursued, dogged, and way-laid through several nations, and even now scarce think myself secure. Pope.
Hate dogs their rise, and insult mocks their fall. V. of Human W.

Dog-fisher, dôg'fîsh-ûr. n. s. [dog and fisher.] A kind of fish.
The dog-fisher is good against the falling sickness. Walton.

Dog-teeth, dog'têêth. n. s. [dog and teeth.] The teeth in the human head next to the grinders; the eye-teeth.
The best instruments for dividing of herbs are incisor-teeth; for cracking of hard substances, as bones and nuts, grinders or mill-teeth; for dividing of flesh, sharp-pointed or dog-teeth. Arbuthnot.

Dog-trick, dôg'trîk. n.s. [dog and trick.] An ill-turn; surly or brutal treatment.
Learn better manners, or I shall serve you a dog-trick; I'll make you know your rider. Dryden.

Do'gbane, dôg'bâne. n. s. [dog and bane.] A plant. Miller.

Dogberry-tree, dôg-bêr-rê-trêê. A kind of cherry.

Do'gbolt, dôg'bôlt. n. s. [dog and bolt.] Of this word I know not the meaning, unless it be, that when meal or flour is sifted or bolted to a certain degree, the coarser part is called dogbolt, or flower for dogs
His only solace was, that now
His dogbolt fortune was so low,
That either it must quickly end,
Or turn about again and mend. Hudibras.

Do'gbriar, dôg'brî-ûr. n. s. [dog and briar.] The briar that bears the hip; the cynosbaton.

Do'gcheap, dôg'tshêêp. adj. [dog and cheap.] Cheap as dog's meat; cheap as the offal bought for dogs.
Good store of harlots, say you, and dogcheap? Dryden.

Do'gdays, dôg'dâze. n.s. [dog and days.] The days in which the dogstar rises and sets with the sun, vulgarly reputed unwholesome.
Nor was it more in his power to be without promotion and titles, than for a healthy man to sit in the sun, in the brightest dogdays, and remain without warmth. Clarendon.

Do'gdraw, dôg'drâw. n. s. [dog and draw.] A manifest deprehension of an offender against venison in the forest, when he is found drawing after a deer by the scent of a hound which he leads in his hand. Cowell.

Doge, dôje. n. s. [doge, Italian.] The title of the chief magistrate of Venice and Genoa.
Doria has a statue at the entrance of the doge's palace, with the title of deliverer of the commonwealth. Addison.

Do'gfish, dôg'fîsh. n. s. [from dog and fish.] Another name for a shark.
It is part of the jaw of a shark, or dog-fish. Woodward.

Do'gfly, dôg'flî. n. s. [dog and fly.] A voracious biting fly.
Thump-buckler Mars began,
And at Minerva with a lance of brass he headlong ran;
These vile words ushering his blows, Thou dog-fly, what's the cause
Thou makest gods fight thus? Chapman.

Do'gged, dôg'gêd.[365] adj. [from dog.] Sullen; sour; morose; ill-humoured; gloomy.
Your uncle must not know but you are dead:
I'll fill these dogged spies with false reports. Shaksp.
Dogged York, that reaches at the moon,
Whose over-weening arm I have pluck'd back,
By false accuse doth level at my life. Shaksp.
Few miles on horseback had they jogged,
But fortune unto them turn'd dogged. Hudibras.

Do'ggedly, dôg'gêd-lê. adv. [from dogged.] Sullenly; gloomily; sourly; morosely.

Do'ggedness, dôg'gêd-nês. n. s. [from dogged.] Gloom of mind; sullenness; moroseness.

Do'gger, dôg'gûr.[98] n. s. [from dog, for its meanness. Skinner.] A small ship with one mast.

Do'ggerel, dôg'grêl. adj. [from dog.] Loosed from the measures or rules of regular poetry; vile; despicable; mean: used of verses.
Then hasten Og and Doeg to rehearse,
Two fools that crutch their feeble sense on verse
Who by my muse to all succeeding times
Shall live, in spite of their own dogg'rel rhymes. Dryden.
Your wit burlesque may one step higher climb,
And in his sphere may judge all dogg'rel rhyme. Dryden.
It is a dispute among the criticks, whether burlesque poetry runs best in heroick verse, like that of the Dispensary; or in doggrel, like that of Hudibras. Addison.

Do'ggerel, dôg'grêl. n. s. Mean, despicable, worthless verses.
The hand and head were never lost of those
Who dealt in dogg'rel, or who pin'd in prose. Dryden
The vilest dogg'rel Grub-street sends,
Will pass for yours with foes and friends. Swift.

Do'ggish, dôg'gish. adj. [from dog.] Churlish; brutal.

Do'ghearted, dôg'hâr-têd. adj. [dog and heart.] Cruel; pitiless; malicious.
His unkindness,
That stript her from his benediction, turn'd her
To foreign casualties, gave her dear rights
To his doghearted daughters. Shaksp.

Do'ghole, dôg'hôle. n.s. [dog and hole.] A vile hole; a mean habitation.
France is a doghole, and it no more merits the tread of a man's foot: to the wars. Shaksp.
But could you be content to bid adieu
To the dear playhouse, and the players too,
Sweet country seats are purchas'd ev'ry where,
With lands and gardens, at less price than here
You hire a darksome doghole by the year. Dryden.
Reverse your ornaments and hang them all
On some patch'd doghole ek'd with ends of wall. Pope.

Do'gkennel, dôg'kên-nêl. n. s. [dog and kennel.] A little hut or house for dogs.
A certain nobleman, beginning with a dogkennel, never lived to finish the palace he had contrived. Dryden.
I am desired to recommend a dogkennel to any that shall want a pack. Tatler.

Do'glouse, dôg'lôûse. n. s. [dog and louse.] An insect that harbours on dogs.

DO'GMA, dôg'mâ. n. s. [Latin.]

1. Established principle; doctrinal notion.
Our poet was a stoick philosopher, and all his moral sentences are drawn from the dogmas of that sect. Dryden.

2. [In canon law.] Dogma is that determination which consists in, and has a relation to, some casuistical point of doctrine, or some doctrinal part of the christian faith. Ayliffe.

Dogma'tical. } dôg-mât'îk.[509]. } adj.
Dogma'tick. } dôg-mât'ê-kâl. } [from dogma.] Authoritative; magisterial; positive; in the manner of a philosopher laying down the first principles of a sect.
The dim and bounded intellect of man seldom prosperously adventures to be dogmatical about things that approach to infinite, whether in vastness or littleness. Boyle.
I laid by my natural diffidence and scepticism for a while, to take up that dogmatical way which is so much his character. Dryden.
Learning gives us a discovery of our ignorance, and keeps us from being peremptory and dogmatical in our determinations. Collier.
Criticks write in a positive dogmatick way, without either language, genius, or imagination. Spect.
One of these authors is indeed so grave, sententious, dogmatical a rogue, that there is no enduring him. Swift.

DOGMA'TICALLY, dôg-mât-ê-kâl-lê. adv. [from dogmatical.] Magisterially; positively.

I shall not presume to interpose dogmatically in a controversy, which I look never to be decided. South.

DOGMA'TICALNESS, dôg-mât'ê-kâl-nês. n. s. [from dogmatical.] The quality of being dogmatical; magisterialness; mock authority.

DO'GMATIST, dôg-mâ-tîst. n. s. [dogmatiste, Fr.] A magisterial teacher; a positive asserter; a bold advancer of principles.

I could describe the vanity of bold opinion, which the dogmatists themselves demonstrate in all the controversies they are engaged in. Glanville.

A dogmatist in religion is not a great way off from a bigot, and is in high danger of growing up to be a bloody persecutor. Watts.

To DO'GMATIZE, dôg'mâ-tize. v. n. [from dogma.] To assert positively; to advance without distrust; to teach magisterially.

These, with the pride of dogmatizing schools,
Impos'd on nature arbitrary rules;
Forc'd her their vain inventions to obey,
And move as learned frenzy trac'd the way.
Blackmore.

DOGMATI'ZER, dôg'mâ-ti-zûr. n. s. [from dogmatize.] An asserter; a magisterial teacher; a bold advancer of opinions.

Such opinions, being not entered into the confessions of our church, are not properly chargeable either on papists or protestants, but on particular dogmatizers of both parties. Hammond.

DO'GROSE, dôg'rôse. n. s. [dog and rose.] The flower of the hip.

Of the rough or hairy excrescence, those on the briar, or dogrose, are a good instance. Derham.

DO'GSLEEP, dôg'slêêp. n. s. [dog and sleep.] Pretended sleep.

Juvenal indeed mentions a drowsy husband, who raised an estate by snoring; but then he is represented to have slept what the common people call dogsleep. Add.

DO'GSMEAT, dôgz'mête. n. s. [dog and meat.] Refuse; vile stuff; offal like the flesh sold to feed dogs.

His reverence bought of me the flower of all the market; these are but dogsmeat to 'em. Dryden.

DO'GSTAR, dôg'stâr. n. s. [dog and star; canicula, Lat.] The star which gives the name to the dogdays.

All shun the raging dogstar's sultry heat,
And from the half un-peopled town retreat. Addison.

DO'GSTOOTH, dôgz'tôôth. n. s. [from dog and tooth.] A plant. Miller.

DO'GTROT, dôg'trôt n. s. [dog and trot.] A gentle trot like that of a dog.

This said, they both advanc'd, and rode
A dogtrot through the bawling crowd. Hudibras.

DOGWE'ARY, dôg-wê'rê. adj. [dog and weary.] Tired as a dog; excessively weary.

Oh, master, master, I have watch'd so long,
That I'm dogweary. Shaksp.

DO'GWOOD, dôg'wûd. n. s. A species of cornelian cherry.

DOI'LY, dôê'lê. n. s. A species of woollen stuff, so called, I suppose, from the name of the first maker.

We should be as weary of one set of acquaintance, though never so good, as we are of one suit, though never so fine: a fool, and a doily stuff, would now and then find days of grace, and be worn for variety. Congreve.

DO'INGS, dôô'îngz. n. s. [from To do. This word has hardly any singular.]

1. Things done; events; transactions.

I have but kill'd a fly.—
—But how if that fly had a father and mother?
How would he hang his slender gilded wings,
And buz lamented doings in the air! Shaksp.

2. Feats; actions: good or bad.

The next degree was to mark all Zelmane's doings, speeches, and fashions, and to take them unto herself, as a pattern of worthy proceeding. Sidney.

If I'm traduc'd by tongues which neither know
My faculties nor person, yet will be
The chronicles of my doing, let me say
'Tis but the fate of place, and the rough brake
That virtue must go through. Shaksp.

At length a reverend sire among them came,
And of their doings great dislike declar'd,
And testified against their ways. Milton.

3. Behaviour; conduct.

Never the earth on his round shoulders bare
A maid train'd up from high or low degree,
That in her doings better could compare
Mirth with respect, few words with courtesy.
Sidney.

4. Conduct; dispensation.

Dangerous it were for the feeble brains of man to wade far into the doings of the Most High. Hooker.

5. Stir; bustle; tumult.

3. Provisions or money distributed in charity.

They had such firm dependence on the day,
That need grew pamper'd, and forgot to pray;
So sure the dole, so ready at their call,
They stood prepar'd to see the manna fall. Dryden.

Clients of old were feasted: now a poor
Divided dole is dealt at th' outward door,
Which by the hungry rout is soon dispatch'd.
Dryden's Juvenal.

4. Blows dealt out.

What if his eye-sight, for to Israel's God
Nothing is hard, by miracle restor'd,
He now be dealing dole among his foes,
And over heaps of slaughter'd walk his way?
Milton.

5. [from dolor.] Grief; sorrow; misery. Obsolete.

Yonder they lie; the poor old man, their father, making such pitiful dole over them, that all beholders take his part with weeping. Shakspeare.

Our sometime sister, now our queen,
Have we, as 'twere, with a defeated joy,
With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
Taken to wife. Shakspeare's Hamlet.

They might hope to change
Torment with ease, and soonest recompense,
Dole with delight. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Destin'd to love, as they are doom'd to reign.
Granville.

Doom, dōōm. n. s. [ᵹom, Sax. doem, Dutch.]

1. Judicial sentence; judgment.

He's fled, my lord, and all his pow'rs do yield;
And humbly thus, with halters on their necks,
Expect your highness' doom of life or death. Shak.

To Satan, first in sin, his doom applied,
Though in mysterious terms, judg'd as then best.
Milton.

And now without redemption, all mankind
Must have been lost, adjudg'd to death and hell
By doom severe. Milton.

In the great day, wherein the secrets of all hearts shall be laid open, no one shall be made to answer for what he knows nothing of; but shall receive his doom, his conscience accusing or excusing him. Locke.

2. The great and final judgment.

Search Windsor Castle, elves, within and out:
Strew good luck, ouphes, on every sacred room,
That it may stand till the perpetual doom. Shaksp.

3. Condemnation; judicial sentence.

Revoke thy doom,
Or whilst I can vent clamour from my throat,
I'll tell thee thou dost evil. Shaksp. King Lear.

Martin's office is now the second door in the street, where he will see Parnel. Arbuthnot.

Lambs, though they are bred within doors, and never saw the actions of their own species, push at those who approach them with their foreheads. Addison's Spectator.

The sultan entered again the peasant's house, and turned the owner out of doors. Addison.

3. Entrance; portal.

The tender blades of grass appear;
And buds, that yet the blast of Eurus fear,
Stand at the door of life, and doubt to clothe the year. Dryden.

4. Passage; avenue; means of approach.

The indispensable necessity of sincere obedience shuts the door against all temptations to carnal security. Hammond.

5. Out of Door, or Doors. No more to be found; quite gone; fairly sent away.

Should he, who was thy lord, command thee now,
With a harsh voice and supercilious brow,
To servile duties thou wouldst fear no more;
The gallows and the whip are out of door. Dryden.
His imaginary title of fatherhood is out of doors, and Cain is no prince over his brother. Locke.

6. At the DOOR of any one. Imputable; chargeable upon him.
In any of which parts if I have failed, the fault lies wholly at my door. Dryden.

7. Next DOOR to. Approaching to; near to; bordering upon.
A seditious word leads to a broil, and a riot unpunished is but next door to a tumult. L' Estrange.

DO'ORCASE, dôre'kâse. n. s. [door and case.] The frame in which the door is enclosed.
The making of frames for doorcases, is the framing of two pieces of wood athwart two other pieces. Moxon.

DO'ORKEEPER, dôre'kêêp-ûr. n. s. [door and keeper.] Porter; one that keeps the entrance of a house.
He that hath given the following assistances to thee, desires to be even a doorkeeper in God's house, and to be a servant to the meanest of God's servants. Taylor's Preface.

DO'QUET, dôk'ît.[99] [415] n. s. A paper containing a warrant.
Before the institution of this office, no doquet for licence to alien, nor warrant for pardon of alienation made, could be purchased without an oath. Bacon.

DO'RMANT, dôr'mânt. adj. [dormant, French.]

1. Sleeping.
He a dragon! if he be, 'tis a very peaceful one: I can insure his anger is dormant: or should he seem to rouse, 'tis well lashing him, and he will sleep like a top. Congreve's Old Bachelor.
With this radius he is said to strike and kill his prey, for which he lies as it were, dormant, till it swims within his reach. Grew's Musæum.

2. In a sleeping posture.
If a lion were the coat of Judah, yet were it not a lion rampant, but rather couchant and dormant. Brown.

3. Private; not publick.
There were other dormant musters of soldiers throughout all parts of the realms, that were put in readiness but not drawn together. Bacon.

4. Concealed; not divulged.
It would be prudent to reserve these privileges dormant, never to be produced but upon great occasions. Swift.

5. Leaning; not perpendicular.
Old dormant windows must confess
Her beams: their glimmering spectacles,
Struck with the splendor of her face,
Do th' office of a burning glass. Cleveland.

DO'RMITORY, dôr'mê-tûr-ê. n. s. [dormitorium, Latin.]

1. A place to sleep in; used commonly for a room with many beds.
Rooms that have thorough lights are left for entertainment, and those that have windows on one side for dormitories. Mortimer.
Naked mourns the dormitory wall,
And Jones and Boyle's united labours fall. Pope.

2. A burial place.
The places where dead bodies are buried, are in Latin called cæmiteria, and in English dormitories. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DO'RMOUSE, dôr'môûse. n. s. [dormio, to sleep, and mouse.] A small animal which passes a large part of the winter in sleep.
Come, we all sleep, and are mere dormice flies,
A little less than dead: more dulness hangs
On us than on the moon. Ben Jonson's Cataline.
After they have lain a little while, they grow as drowsy as dormice, unless they are roused. Collier.

DORN, dôrn. n. s. [from dorn, German, a thorn.] A fish; perhaps the same as the thornback.
The coast is stored both with shell-fish, as scallops and sheath-fish; and flat, as turbets, dorns, and holybut. Carew.

DO'RNICK, dôr'nîk. n. s. [of Deornick in Flanders, where first made.] A species of linen cloth used in Scotland for the table.

To DORR, dôr. v. a. [tor, stupid, Teutonick.] To deafen or stupify with noise. This word I find only in Skinner.

DORR, dôr. n. s. [so named probably from the noise which he makes.] A kind of flying insect, remarkable for flying with a loud noise.
Some insects fly with four wings, as all the vagimpennous, or sheath-winged, as beetles and dorrs. Brown's Vulgar Errours.
The dorr or hedge-chafer's chief marks are these: his head is small, like that of the common beetle: this, and his eyes, black: his shoulderpiece, and the middle of his belly also black; but just under the wing-shell spotted with white. His wing-shells, legs, and the end of his tail, which is long and flat-pointed, of a light chestnut: his breast, especially, covered with a downy hair. Grew's Musæum.

DO'RSEL, DO'RSER, dôr'sûl, dôr'sûr. n. s. [from dorsum, the back.] A pannier; a basket or bag, one of which hangs on either side a beast of burden, for the reception of things of small bulk. It is corruptly spoken, and perhaps written, dossel.

DORSI'FEROUS, DORSI'PAROUS, dôr-sîf'fê-rûs, dôr-sîp'pâ-rûs [513] adj. [dorsum and fero, or pario, Latin.] Having the property of bearing, or bringing forth, on the back. It is used of plants that have the seed on the back of their leaves, as fern; and may be properly used of the American frog, which brings forth her young from her back.

DO'RTURE, dôr'tûre. n. s. [contracted from dormiture; dormitura, Latin; dortoir, Fr.] A dormitory; a place to sleep in.
He led us to a gallery like a dorture, where he shewed us along the one side seventeen cells, very neat. Bacon.

DOSE, dôse. n. s. [δόσις.]

1. So much of any medicine as is taken at one time. Quincy.
The too vig'rous dose too fiercely wrought,
And added fury to the strength it brought. Dryden.
In a vehement pain of the head he prescribed the juice of the thapsia in warm water, without mentioning the dose. Arbuthnot.

2. Any thing nauseous.
If you can tell an ignoramus in power and place that he has a wit and understanding above all the world, I dare undertake that, as fulsome a dose as you give him, he shall readily take it down. South.

3. As much of any thing as falls to a man's lot. Ludicrously.
No sooner does he peep into
The world, but he has done his doe;
Married his punctual dose of wives,
Is cuckolded, and breaks or thrives. Hudibras.

4. Quantity.
We pity or laugh at those fatuous extravagants, while yet ourselves have a considerable dose of what makes them so. Glanville.

5. It is often used of the utmost quantity of strong liquor that a man can swallow. He has his dose; that is, he can carry off no more.

To DOSE, dôse. v. a.

1. To proportion a medicine properly to the patient or disease.
Plants seldom used in medicine, being esteemed poisonous, if corrected, and exactly dosed, may prove powerful medicines. Derham.

2. To give physick, or any thing nauseous, to any man: in a ludicrous sense.

DO'SSIL, DÔS'SÛL. n. s. [corrupted from dorsel, something laid upon the part.] A pledget; a nodule or lump of lint to be laid on a sore.
Her complaints put me upon dressing with such medicaments as basilicon, with præcipitate, upon a dossil. Wiseman.

DOST, dûst. The second person of do.
Why then dost treat me with rebukes, instead
Of kind condoling cares and friendly sorrow. Addison.

DOT, dôt. n. s. [This is derived by Skinner from dotter, German, the white of an egg; and interpreted by him a grume of pus. It has now no such signification, and seems rather corrupted from jot, a point.] A small point or spot made to mark any place in a writing.

To DOT, dôt. v. a. To mark with specks.

To DOT, dôt. v. n. [from the noun.] To make dots or spots.

DO'TAGE, dô'tâdje.[90] n. s. [from dote.]

1. Loss of understanding; imbecility of mind; deliriousness.
The soul in all hath one intelligence;
Though too much moisture in an infant's brain,
And too much driness in an old man's sense,
Cannot the prints of outward things retain:
Then doth the soul want work, and idle sit;
And this we childishness and dotage call. Davies.
I hold, that perfect joy makes all our parts
As joyful as our hearts:
Our senses tell us, if we please not them,
Our love is but a dotage, or a dream. Suckling.

2. Excessive fondness.
If on your head my fury does not turn,
Thank that fond dotage which so much you scorn. Dryden.

DO'TAL, dô'tâl.[88] adj. [dotalis, Latin.] Relating to the portion of a woman; constituting her portion; comprised in her portion.
Shall I, of one poor dotal town possest,
My people thin, my wretched country waste,
An exil'd prince, and on a shaking throne,
Or risk my patron's subjects, or my own? Garth.

DO'TARD, dô'târd.[88] n. s. [from dote.] A man whose age has impaired his intellects; a man in his second childhood, called in some provinces a twichild.
Dotard, said he, let be thy deep advise,
Seems that through many years thy wits thee fail,
And that weak old hath left thee nothing wise,
Else never should thy judgment be so frail. Fairy Queen.
The sickly dotard wants a wife,
To draw off his last dregs of life. Prior.

DOTA'TION, dô-tâ'shûn. n. s. [dotatio, Lat.] The act of giving a dowry or portion. Dict.

To DOTE, dôte. v. n. [doten, Dutch; radoter, French.]

1. To have the intellect impaired by age or passion; to be delirious.

Unless the fear of death make me to dote,
I see my son. Shaksp.

A sword is upon the liars, and they shall dote: a sword is upon her mighty men, and they shall be dismayed. Jer.

Time has made you dote, and vainly tell
Of arms imagin'd in your lonely cell:
Go, be the temple and the gods your care;
Permit to men the thought of peace and war. Dryd.

When an old woman begins to dote, and grow chargeable to her parish, she is turned into a witch, and fills the country with extravagant fancies. Addison.

2. To be in love to extremity.

He was stricken with great affection towards me, which since is grown to such a doting love, that I was fain to get this place sometimes to retire in freely. Sidney.

I have long loved her, and bestowed much on her, followed her with a doting observance. Shaks.

3. To Dote upon. To regard with excessive fondness; to love to excess.

All their prayers and love
Were set on Hereford, whom they doted on,
And bless'd, and grac'd. Shakspeare.

Forgive me, that I do not dream on thee,
Because thou seest me dote upon my love. Shaksp.

All the beauties of the court besides
Are mad in love, and dote upon your person. Denham.

Mark those who dote on arbitrary power,
And you shall find 'em either hot-brain'd youth,
Or needy bankrupts. Dryden.

Would you so dote upon your first desire,
As not to entertain a nobler fire? Dryden.

We dote upon this present world, and the enjoyments of it; and 'tis not without pain, and fear, and reluctancy, that we are torn from them, as if our hopes lay all within the compass of this life. Burnet.

O death all eloquent! you only prove
What dust we dote on, when 'tis man we love. Pope.

Do'TED, dō'tĕd. adj. [from the verb.] Stupid. Not used.

His senseless speech and doted ignorance
The prince had marked well. Spenser.

Do'TER, dō'tŭr.[98] n. s. [from dote.]

1. One whose understanding is impaired by years; a dotard.

What should a bald fellow do with a comb, a dumb doter with a pipe, or a blind man with a looking-glass. Burton.

2. A man fondly, weakly, and excessively in love.

If in black my lady's brow be deckt,
It mourns that painting and usurping hair
Should ravish doters with a false aspect;
And therefore she is born to make black fair. Shakspeare.

Our doters upon red and white are incessantly perplexed by the incertainty both of the continuance of their mistress's kindness, and of the lasting of her beauty. Boyle.

Do'TINGLY, dō'tĭng-lē. adv. [from doting.] Fondly; by excessive fondness.

That he, to wedlock dotingly betray'd,
Should hope in this lewd town to find a maid? Dryden.

Do'TTARD, dŏt'tărd.[98] n. s. This word seems to signify a tree kept low by cutting.

For great trees, we see almost all overgrown trees in church-yards, or near ancient buildings, and the like, are pollards and dottards, and not trees at their full height. Bacon.

Do'TTEREL, dŏt'tŭr-ĭl.[99] n. s. [from dote.] The name of a bird that mimicks gestures.

We see how ready apes and monkies are to imitate all motions of man; and in catching of dotterels, we see how the foolish bird playeth the ape in gestures. Bacon.

DO'UBLE, dŭb'bl.[314 405] adj. [double, Fr. duplex, Lat. duple, Erse.]

1. Two of a sort; one corresponding to the other; in pairs.

All things are double one against another, and he hath made nothing imperfect. Ecclus.

2. Twice as much; containing the same quantity repeated. It is sometimes used with to, and sometimes without.

Great honours are great burthens; but on whom
They are cast with envy, he doth bear two loads:
His cares must still be double to his joys
In any dignity. Ben Jonson.

This sum of forty thousand pounds is almost double to what is sufficient. Swift.

3. Having one added to another; having more than one in the same order or parallel.

It is a curiosity also to make flowers double, which is effected by often removing them into new earth; as, on the contrary part, double flowers, by neglecting, and not removing, prove single. Bacon.

I met a reverend, fat, old gouty friar,
With a paunch swoln so high, his double chin
Might rest upon 't. Dryden's Spanish Friar.

4. Twofold; of two kinds.

Thus cursed steel, and more accursed gold,
Gave mischief birth, and made that mischief bold;
And double death did wretched man invade,
By steel assaulted, and by gold betray'd. Dryd.

No star appears to lend his friendly light;
Darkness and tempest make a double night. Dryden.

5. Two in number.

And if one power did not both see and hear,
Our sights and sounds would always double be. Davies.

6. Having twice the effect or influence; having the power of two. Not used.

The magnifico is much belov'd,
And hath in his effect a voice potential,
As double as the duke's. Shakspeare's Othello.

7. Deceitful; acting two parts, one openly, the other in secret.

I' th' presence
He would say untruths, and be ever double
Both in his words and meaning. Shakspeare.

Fifty thousand could keep rank, that were not of double heart. 1 Chronicles.

DOUBLE-PLEA, dŭb'bl-plē. n. s. [duplex placitum, Latin.]

Is that in which the defendant alleges for himself two several matters, in bar of the action, whereof either is sufficient to effect his desire in debarring the plaintiff. Cowell.

DOUBLE QUARREL, dŭb'bl-kwŏr'rĭl.

Is a complaint made by any clerk or other to the archbishop of the province, against an inferiour ordinary, for delaying justice in some cause ecclesiastical. The effect is, that the archbishop directs his letters, under the authentical seal, to all clerks of his province, commanding them to admonish the said ordinary within nine days to do the justice required, or otherwise to cite him to appear before him or his official; and lastly to intimate to the said ordinary, that if he neither perform the thing enjoined, nor appears at the day assigned, he himself will proceed to perform the justice required. And this seems to be termed a double quarrel, because it is most commonly made against both the judge, and him at whose petition justice is delayed. Cowell.

DOUBLE, dŭb'bl. adv. Twice over.

I am not so old in proportion to them as I formerly was, which I can prove by arithmetick; for then I was double their age, which now I am not. Swift.

DOUBLE, dŭb'bl. Is much used in composition, generally for doubly, two ways: as, double-edged, having an edge on each side: or for twice the number or quantity; as, double-died, twice died.

DOUBLE-BITING, dŭb-bl-bī'tĭng. adj. [double and bite.] Biting or cutting on either side.

But most their looks on the black monarch bend,
His rising muscles and his brawn commend;
His double-biting ax, and beamy spear,
Each asking a gigantick force to rear. Dryden.

DOUBLE-BUTTONED, dŭb-bl-bŭt'tn'd.[170 359] adj. [double and buttoned.] Having two rows of buttons.

Others you'll see, when all the town's afloat,
Wrapt in th' embraces of a kersey coat,
Or double-button'd frieze. Gay's Trivia.

DOUBLE-DEALER, dŭb-bl-dē'lŭr. n. s. [double and dealer.] A deceitful, subtle, insidious fellow; one who acts two parts at the same time; one who says one thing and thinks another.

Double-dealers may pass muster for a while; but all parties wash their hands of them in the conclusion. L'Estrange.

DOUBLE-DEALING, dŭb-bl-dē'lĭng. n. s. [double and dealing.] Artifice; dissimulation; low or wicked cunning; the action of one thing with the profession of another.

Thou shalt not be the worse for me; there's gold.—
—But that it would be double-dealing, sir, I would you could make it another. Shakspeare.

Our poets have joined together such qualities as are by nature most compatible; valour with anger, meekness with piety, and prudence with dissimulation; this last union was necessary for the goodness of Ulysses; for, without that, his dissimulation might have degenerated into wickedness and double-dealing. Broome.

To DOUBLE-DIE, dŭb-bl-dī'. v. a. [double and die.] To die twice over.

Yes, I'll to the royal bed,
Where first the mysteries of our love were acted,
And double-die it with imperial crimson. Dryden and Lee.

DOUBLE-FOUNTED, dŭb-bl-fŏŭnt'ĕd. adj. [double and fount.] Having two sources.

Here the double-founted stream
Jordan, true limit eastward. Milton.

DOUBLE-HANDED, dŭb-bl-hănd'ĕd. adj. [double and hand.] Having two hands.

All things being double-handed, and having the appearances both of truth and falsehood, where our affections have engaged us, we attend only to the former. Glanville's Scepsis.

DOUBLE-HEADED, dŭb-bl-hĕd'ĕd. adj. [double and head.] Having the flowers growing one to another.

The double rich scarlet nonsuch is a large double-headed flower of the richest scarlet colour. Mortimer.

To DOUBLE-LOCK, dŭb-bl-lŏk'. v. a. [double and lock.] To shoot the lock twice; to fasten with double security.

He immediately double-locked his door, and sat down carefully to reading and comparing both his orders. Tatler.

DOUBLE-MINDED, dŭb-bl-mind'ĕd. adj. [from double and mind.] Unsettled; undetermined.

A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways. James.

DOUBLE-SHINING, dŭb-bl-shin'ĭng.[359] adj.

double and shine.] Shining with double lustre.

He was
Among the rest that there did take delight
To see the sports of double-shining day. Sidney.

DOUBLE-TONGUED, dŭb-bl-tŭng'd'. adj. [double and tongue.] Deceitful; giving contrary accounts of the same thing.

The deacons must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre. 1 Timothy.

For much she fear'd the Tyrians double-tongu'd,
And knew the town to Juno's care belong'd.
Dryden's Virgil.

To DO'UBLE, dŭb'bl. v. a. [from the adjective.]

1. To enlarge any quantity by addition of the same quantity.

Rumour doth double voice and echo
The numbers of the fear'd. Shaks. Henry IV.

Pay him six thousand, and deface the bond;
Double six thousand, and then treble that.
Shakspeare.

Our foe's too proud the weaker to assail,
Or doubles his dishonour if he fail. Dryden.

This power of repeating or doubling any idea we have of any distance, and adding it to the former, as often as we will, without being ever able to come to any stop or stint, is that which gives us the idea of immensity. Locke.
